CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

The letter referred to is as follows:

Senator GALLINGER.

HONORABLE SIR: You will please pardon me for intruding on your time. Seeing that you are about to introduce a bill for the relief of the Mexican veterans raises the question in whether justice does not demand that some legislation is not needed to modify the present ruling of the Pension Department regarding the veterans of our civil war.

You are aware that in order for a veteran to get a pension on a disease he must not only prove that he contracted that disease in the service, but he must give medical proof that it has continued from year to year up to the date of his application for pension for that disease. This is a very hard thing for one to do at the present time, for the reason that since the close of the war many family physicians have died, and some of these veterans had domestic remedies that gave relief for a time and so did not employ a doctor. At this day it ought to be sufficient to show that the disease was contracted in the service and exists at the present time, or its legitimate results. As an illustration I will give a brief history of my own case.

At the commencement of the war I served in Company K, First Maine Cavalry, and was discharged in October, 1862. I enlisted again, October, 1864, in Company G, Sixteenth Maine Infantry, and served to the close of the war. In both of these services I was badly afflicted with chronic diarrhea. When I left the service I had no thought of ever asking for or receiving a pension. I did not ask for a pension until 1884, when I applied for and received a pension for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart and lung, but did not include diarrhea. In 1888 my hands became badly inflamed and swollen, and ulcerations and hemorrhage set it. Hoping that it was a temporary attack and would pass off, I waited until 1889. Getting no relief, I asked for a pension on the chronic diarrhea. I gave in evidence two comrades' affidavits from First Maine Cavalry, two from Sixteenth Maine Infantry, and the regimental surgeon's affidavit, two neighbors' affidavits, and my family physician's affidavit. I was examined by the Damariscotta board of examining physicians in the fall of 1889. In due time I was informed from the Pension Office that in case I could not furnish medical proof of the continuance of the disease from the time of my discharge, June 6, 1865, up to 1889, I should send my family's affidavit. My wife gave her's—the only one who could do so—and I again made affidavit, stating just why I could not furnish medical affidavit of the continuance of the disease from 1865 up to 1889, the reason being that I had a domestic remedy that gave relief up to 1888, when inflammation and ulcerations set in; therefore did not employ a physician. In July, 1897, I was sent to Bath, Me., for an examination, and in the following August notified that my claim was rejected on the account of my being unable to furnish medical evidence of the continuation of chronic diarrhea from the time of my discharge, June 6, 1865, up to 1889. I called for a review of my claim, but was denied. In October, 1902, I sent to the Pension Office the affidavit of Dr. Solon Bartlett, of Lowell, Mass., and asked to have my claim opened again, but was denied. In August, 1904, I sent to Pension Office affidavit of Dr. John L. Plunket, of Boston, Mass., with whom I had been doctoring, and was again refused a review of my claim, the reason being that this affidavit did not show continuance of chronic diarrhea from the date of my discharge from service to 1889.

All these papers are on file in the Pension Office, which I think you can examine if you wish.

Now, is there not an injustice here? I have given you my own case, which I presume illustrates not a few who are, like myself, suffering from diseases contracted in the service, but under present ruling of the Pension Office can get no compensation. Ought there not to be some legislation to meet such cases?

I have written to you and called your attention to this matter, because you are on the Committee on Pensions. You are at liberty to use my claim if it will help other comrades, who, like myself, are unable to get what is their just due.

At the present time my bowels are so inflamed and swollen that I can not sit in a common chair, but have to have an elevated seat. I also have a tumor in the left abdomen which is the direct result of this chronic diarrhea. It is with difficulty that I stoop or reach my feet, and yet the rulings of the Pension Office say I shall have no compensation for this. Trusting you will pardon this intrusion on your time, I am,

Truly, yours,

T. G. LYONS,
157 Shaw street, Lowell, Mass.

MARCH 15, 1906.

My claim is: Thomas G. Lyons, No. 343002, Company K, First Maine Cavalry; Company G, Sixteenth Maine Troops.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before voting upon the bill I think it is proper to give a very short statement of some of the conditions at the present time.

The increase in the pension bill over last year is, in round numbers, about $2,000,000. Last year it was $138,000,000, and this year $140,000,000, in round numbers. This increase is due to three causes. The first is the large number now receiving pensions who were soldiers in the war with Spain. Another is that the number of pension claims not considered is far less this year than it has been for a number of years. The third is the extra number who are coming in very rapidly under the old rule or order which we understand and know here as Order No. 78, which provides that when a soldier has reached the age of 62 years it shall be an evidential fact of his inability to perform manual labor.

There has been a great number of private pension bills passed within the last few Congresses, and for the purpose of assuring Senators that we are not bankrupting the Government by these private pension bills, I desire to call attention to the number of private pension bills that have been passed each year and also the annual increase due to those special acts.

In 1901 there were only 707 passed, and the annual increase due to special acts was $120,192. In 1902 there was 1,114, and the annual increase due to special acts was $182,825. In 1903 there were 1,057, and the annual increase due to special acts was $155,922. In 1904 there were 1,854 special acts, and the annual increase due to them was $274,576. In 1905, 1,500 special acts were passed, and the annual increase due to them was $222,084.

You will see, therefore, taking as the basis of the entire pension appropriation the even sum of $140,000,000, that the increase which was granted to 1,500 persons during the last year amounted to but $222,084. It amounted to less than one-sixth of 1 per cent of the amount appropriated during the year.

The plan, I think, has been very beneficial, especially since we have not given general pensions to any extent considerably higher than we have done up to the present time, because we are able to reach those cases of destitution where the exigency of the case demands special treatment, and it has been done with comparatively very little additional expense to the Government.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. I listened with some care to his statement, but I failed to catch it if the Senator explained it. What is the difference between this legislation and the Executive order which heretofore fixed an age limit?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator refers to the amendment which has been adopted?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. It makes it the law, rather than a mere order. The provision was inserted by the House, and we simply modified it, as we thought, so as to more clearly express what was desired.

Mr. BACON. It has practically the same provisions that were in the Executive order?

Mr. McCUMBER. Practically the same provisions.

Mr. BACON. I suppose it can be taken to indicate a belief on the part of those who favor the amendment that the Executive order was of doubtful legality?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not consider it at all of doubtful legality, but of doubtful effect, because under the Executive order it was simply an evidential fact. Under this provision it will become a positive fact, which will be taken into consideration by the Department.

Mr. BACON. Am I to understand the Senator as saying that he recognizes that an Executive order can be effective so far as it constitutes simply an evidential fact, but if it is to make it a fact a statute is required? Does the Senator draw that distinction?

Mr. McCUMBER. It was simply prima facie evidence. Certainly an Executive order may determine the character of evidence which shall be received and what shall be deemed to be prima facie evidence in a case. I do not think it can go further than that, of course.

Mr. BACON. You do not think it can make the evidence conclusive, but it can make it prima facie?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all it attempted to do.

Mr. BACON. I understood it was so intended, but I wanted to get the view of the Senator as to the law of the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. My own view is that the law will make it absolute, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the paragraphs on page 6 of the report of the Committee on Pensions, under the heading "Pensions of the several wars and of the peace establishment," be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the portion of the report indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PENSIONS OF THE SEVERAL WARS AND OF THE PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The following statement shows the amounts that have been paid to soldiers, sailors, and marines, their widows, minor children, and dependent relatives on account of military and naval service in the wars in which the United States has been engaged and during the time of peace:

War of the Revolution (estimated)	$70,000,000.00
War of 1812 (on account of service, without regard to disability)	45,440,790.97
Indian wars (on account of service, without regard to disability)	7,637,268.53
War with Mexico (on account of service, without regard to disability)	36,682,848.87
War of the rebellion	3,144,395,405.26
War with Spain	11,996,198.63
Regular establishment	4,707,510.72
Actual total disbursements in pensions	3,320,860,022.98

It is proper to state that in the above table the amounts paid as pensions for disabilities and deaths due to military and naval service in the wars of 1812 and with Mexico, and during the time of peace prior to the civil war, and of the regular military and naval establishments since the close of the civil war have heretofore been charged to the war of the rebellion.

To determine the actual amount chargeable to the war of the rebellion the sum of $16,000,000 should therefore be deducted from that item in the table, that being the estimated amount charged to said war which does not properly belong to that item.

MOVEMENTS OF VESSELS IN VIRGINIA WATERS.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4774) relating to the movements and anchorage of vessels in Hampton Roads, the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, and adjacent waters, in the State of Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. FRYE. It is absolutely necessary, especially as the Jamestown Exposition is coming off shortly, for the display of ships.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not object to having the bill read for information. I should like to hear it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. The explanation is very simple. These waters are now so populous in ships that it has become absolutely necessary that some one shall make rules and regulations for their anchorage, etc. In all populous harbors in that regard there are the same rules and regulations provided. In view of the fact that the Jamestown Exposition is to take place before a great while, and there is to be a naval display in those waters, it is very important that the bill shall become a law. It is nothing unusual, I will say to the Senator. It applies to all harbors where ships are frequent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Maine. I see that the remission of fines is placed in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Is that usual in cases of that kind?

Mr. FRYE. That is usual, because it very frequently happens that there is a breaking of the law without any intent or purpose to do so. That power has been given to the Secretary of the Treasury in nearly all cases where fines are imposed, and it is now in this bill given to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, under whom the regulations come.

Mr. DANIEL. I will ask the Senator, with his kind permission, another question. This is in execution of the powers of Congress, is it not?

Mr. FRYE. It is.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it a delegation of the legislative power to confer the power on subordinate officers of the Government to make these laws?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; to make rules and regulations.

Mr. DANIEL. It is a delegation?

Mr. FRYE. A delegation of power to make rules and regulations. Of course the Congress of the United States has absolute power over its navigable waters.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course it has, and over every foot of ground to which its jurisdiction extends, within the limitations of fundamental principles. I hope the Senator does not think that we are unduly delegating legislative power in this matter. It is contended, in regard to the rate measure, that in delegating or conferring the power to make rates we are giving away our own powers.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Maine declines to express any opinion concerning the rate question on this harbor question.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senator will let the bill lie over until to-morrow. I do not desire to oppose it, but I should like to look at it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being objection to the consideration of the bill, it will lie over.

RELIEF OF CUSTER COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4736) for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to the board of county commissioners of Custer County, Mont., $4,350, in full settlement of all demands against the United States for the construction of a steel bridge across the Tongue River for the accommodation of the Fort Keogh Military Reservation in Montana.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

P. F. U. RUBBER COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, and invites the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

The bill (H. R. 16381) leasing and demising certain lands in La Plata County, Colo., to the P. F. U. Rubber Company was read twice by its title.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I introduced a bill for the same purpose, that was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. A week or so ago I was authorized to report the bill favorably. Knowing that this bill was before the House and would likely pass, I hesitated reporting it. I now ask unanimous consent that the House bill, the title of which has just been read, be substituted for the bill (S. 3248) to set aside portions of the public domain for experiments in rubber culture, and that the House bill be taken up and considered; and then I shall ask that Senate bill 3248 be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado reports a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3248) to set aside portions of the public domain for experiments in rubber culture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks that the House bill just laid before the Senate be substituted in place of the Senate bill reported by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the substitution is made. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill.

Mr. KEAN. What is the number of the Senate bill on the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has just been reported. The House bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senate bill No. 3248 will be indefinitely postponed.

CITY OF M'ALESTER, IND. T.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12845) to consolidate the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, in the Indian Territory.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 3. That the present city government of the city of South McAlester shall exercise all municipal powers over the city of McAlester created by this act until their successors are elected and qualified in accordance with existing law, and that at the municipal election held on the first Tuesday in April, 1906, there shall be elected from the territory heretofore known as McAlester four additional members of the city council of the city of McAlester created by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS, WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4109) to increase the efficiency of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department shall hereafter be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and while holding that office he shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLMENTS AND LICENSES OF VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4886) to simplify the issue of enrollments and licenses of vessels of the United States.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Commissioner of Navigation, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, from time to time to consolidate into one document in the case of any vessel of the United States of 20 net register tons or over the form of enrollment prescribed by section 4319 of the Revised Statutes and the form of license prescribed by section 4321 of of the Revised Statutes, and such consolidated form shall hereafter be issued to a vessel of the United States in lieu of the separate enrollment and license now prescribed by law, and shall be deemed sufficient compliance with the requirements of laws relating to the subject.

Section 2 proposes to amend section 4325 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

SEC. 4325. The license granted to any vessel shall be presented for renewal by indorsement to the collector of customs of the district in which the vessel then may be within three days after the expiration of the time for which it was granted, or if she be absent at that time within three days from her first arrival within a district. In case of change of build, ownership, district, trade, or arrival under temporary papers in the district where she belongs the license shall be surrendered. If the master shall fail to deliver the license he shall be liable to a penalty of $10, which shall not be mitigated.

Section 3 provides that this act shall not be construed to amend any law now in force concerning the compensation of officers of the customs for service connected with the enrollment and license of vessels.

Section 4 provides that the act shall take effect on and after January 1, 1907.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. FRANCIS RIVER, ARKANSAS, BRIDGE.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the absence of the Senator from Arkansas I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 15583) to authorize the Madison Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in St. Francis County, Ark., at or near the town of Madison, in said county and State.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection it was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 21, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate on this bill, under the order of the House, having expired, the Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk (proceeding with the reading of the bill) read as follows:

Office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper: For Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, $4,500; horse and wagon for his use, $420, or so much thereof as may be necessary; for clerk to Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; assistant doorkeeper, $2,592; acting assistant doorkeeper, $2,592; three messengers, acting as assistant doorkeepers, at $1,800 each; forty-seven messengers, at $1,440 each; two assistant messengers on the floor of the Senate, at $1,440 each; messenger to Official Reporters' room, to be selected by the Official Reporters, $1,440; messenger in charge of storeroom, $1,600; upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440; three carpenters to assist him, at $960 each; janitor, $1,200; skilled laborer, $1,000; four skilled laborers, at $900 each; laborer in charge of private passage, $840; two female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring room, at $720 each; two telephone operators, at $900 each; telephone page, $720; press gallery page, $720; two laborers, at $840 each; twenty-four laborers, at $900 each; twenty-eight laborers, at $720 each; sixteen pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $4,760; in all, $154,944.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill about the three carpenters to assist the Sergeant-at-Arms, referred to in line 24 of page 6.

Mr. LITTAUER. Those are services in connection with the Senate. We simply know that they are annually provided for. As to their special duties, we are not particularly informed.

Mr. PRINCE. You know that they want them?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $50,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in lines 19, 20, and 21, page 9, is the item—

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $50,000.

Can the gentleman inform us what that $50,000 is to be expended for?

Mr. LITTAUER. The $50,000 is but a small portion of what probably will be expended under the caption of "Miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor." We always place in this bill an appropriation of $50,000 for this purpose. When it goes over to the Senate it usually comes back to us with the item increased to $100,000, and then comes a deficiency of $50,000 more. Many statements have come to us that this item is used in large part to pay annual salaries. We call the attention of those with whom we are brought in contact in the other body to this item and to the abuses that may be connected therewith, about which we know nothing except by rumor, and they advise us that the item is in their care; that they are responsible for it; that they would like very much to eliminate some of it, but that they can not do it; and so we, recognizing their right to control their own expenditure, bow and pass along.

Chaplain: For Chaplain of the House, $1,000.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question about the paragraph which is to follow. I notice that the appropriation that was made in the bill last year for three cabinetmakers has been omitted from this year's appropriation, and so far as I can learn there has been no other method introduced for taking care of the furniture.

Mr. LITTAUER. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that he is wrong in his statement as to the item. This paragraph is not the one, I believe, to which the gentleman means to refer, and that is the three cabinetmakers who have been dropped, under the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. We have now only reached the office of the Clerk.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I am asking for information. How is this work proposed to be done in the future?

Mr. LITTAUER. The amount of work has been very small. I am now referring to the three cabinetmakers hitherto appropriated for under the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. Those three men receive an annual compensation, and they are supposed to be expert in their calling. We were advised by the Superintendent that the work could be done much more economically if these men were not carried as annual officers; that the work could probably be done for one-half or two-thirds of the present cost if, when there was necessity for such work, he would have the opportunity of hiring a skilled mechanic to perform that service.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to state that the Superintendent recommended the abolishment of these three cabinetmakers?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have stated so very clearly.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That is entirely different from the information I have from the Superintendent. I do not wish to come in conflict with the gentlemen, but the Superintendent informed me that the only recommendation he made was that these men were not directly under his supervision as Superintendent of the Capitol Buildings and Grounds, as he had nothing to do with the furniture, and he recommended that they be taken from under his charge and placed elsewhere; but I assure the gentleman that I have no information to the effect that their work is not necessary or that he recommended their abolishment. On the contrary, the information which I received was of an opposite character. In regard to the gentleman's statement that these men are not necessary, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that, in my judgment, this is not in the direction of true economy.

Years ago this matter was under the charge of an officer of the House, known as the "carpenter." The plea was made that he, being a carpenter, was not a skilled cabinetmaker and that it would be wise to abolish the office, and it was so done, and in lieu thereof three skilled cabinetmakers were appointed to take charge of and keep in repair the furniture of the House.

Mr. LITTAUER. In what year was that?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That was about four years ago.

Mr. LITTAUER. Three skilled carpenters were appointed?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Three skilled cabinetmakers were appointed.

Mr. LITTAUER. Has the gentleman any information as to their skill?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I have, particularly in regard to one of them. The allegation that was brought against the carpenter was that his assistant was a cabinetmaker and did all the work, and that is the man who was appointed to carry out this alleged reform. I wish to say, furthermore, that they found the change from the carpenter to the cabinetmaker, and putting in the purchase of supplies and other things under the Clerk of the House, proved a very expensive experiment. In fact, it was so expensive that the chairman of the Committee on Accounts refused to pass his bills until he took them up to the Speaker; they were so extravagant. Now, here comes a proposition to do away with those cabinetmakers who were appointed and do away with the carpenters. In answer to the statement of the gentleman of the alleged economy, it is not founded on facts. The repairing that is done here of small matters has to be attended to at once in order to be of much convenience to Members.

There is no provision made in this bill as to how this work is to be done, and if the proposition is that instead of having these men on the spot with a workshop in the basement of the Capitol, a contract has to be made for the repair of every chair, for every broken desk, for every little matter that has to be attended to, any man who stops to think a moment will see that the bills for such work would run up into the thousands of dollars. As to the allegation that these men are not employed, they are so worked that they have been obliged to work on Sunday. I have here a statement in my hand that shows that I am justified in the position I take on this matter. I have here a list of small repairs that have been ordered since the 1st of March up to the 15th of March.

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman know that one of these men is not a cabinetmaker at all, and that the money that is being paid to him is practically being thrown away at this time, and that this change is being made in the interest of economy?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I do not know that he is not a practical cabinetmaker; I do not know that this will be in the interest of real economy. Why, any man can see that if each little repair of a broken chair or a broken desk or rubbing down of varnish has to be arranged for outside, that it will not be in the interest of economy. There is no provision in this bill putting it anywhere else, and this work has been well and satisfactorily done. I will not take the time of the House to read it, but here is a matter of twenty-two items that were ordered to be attended to between the 1st and the 15th of March. That is the rate at which these repairs are being done, and they have been obliged to work on Sundays.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there is no provision in any way as to how these matters are to be attended to. These three men are simply eliminated; they abolished the carpenter because they wanted a practical cabinetmaker, and now they come in and abolish them and make no provision for this work to go on. These men have done their work well; they have been so busy they have been obliged to work on Sundays; and, more than that, there is no provision made in this bill as to how the work is to be carried on. The convenience of the Members of the House will be materially interfered with by this abolition of these carpenters. It is not a move in an economical direction. Contracts for the repairs of every broken chair and every injured desk that will take place will not be in the interest of economy, but will run up into the thousands of dollars. I protest against this change in the law. It is not subject to a point of order, for they have simply omitted them from the bill instead of bringing the matter up for the consideration of Members on the floor of the House. When the time comes I shall move that they be reinstated and that this real economy be continued.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the service referred to was at one time conducted under the Chief Clerk, but transferred so that now it is under the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. Surely the man in charge of this force ought to know whether it is a proper one; whether or not the work is economically performed. He states to us that these appointments come under patronage as the general appointments in connection with the House. They receive, one of them, $1,200, and two of them $900 annually. The total cost is $3,000, and he says one of them is perhaps competent to do a little of this work and the other two are not at all competent. He says that he can do all of this work for $1,000, having ordinary carpenters connected with his force about the House, and if any little job comes in they can attend to that, and that he would save $2,000 out of the $3,000. It is perfectly natural, then, that we should eliminate the force from the bill, and we believe that we have looked after the proper interests of the House in doing so and that the economy will be positive. Of course I realize that it is difficult, or a least it touches some Members when the members of any of the forces in connection with the House are eliminated, because they are usually appointed on the recommendation of some Members.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I wish to state that this man is not even a constituent of mine.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not claim that he is.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman has insinuated that this was a personal matter.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; I have not intended to insinuate that it was a personal matter. I intended to make only a general remark showing the difficulty that was encountered.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman said it was generally founded on patronage.

Mr. LITTAUER. And so it is, and the man is not engaged because of his peculiar adaptability to this work and his eminent qualifications.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The man I was referring to was employed for that reason, and he says the superintendent says that he has some carpenters now that can do this work.

Mr. BURLESON. What State is he from?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. He has carpenters, and he said he could not do this cabinetwork.

Mr. LITTAUER. He has ordinary carpenters that he engages to do ordinary little jobs around the House, and he tells us that it will save $2,000 out of the $3,000 that this appropriation calls for.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. But a carpenter can not do cabinet work.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know that we have very elaborate cabinetmaking to do here. Once in a while a tack comes out of a chair, or something of that nature, here and there, and then we have these gentlemen around about us with annual compensation, doing little a good part of the year, to make the repairs, and we feel we are simply acting properly toward the House in eliminating the service when the man in charge of it states that it ought to be eliminated and that the work can be done for one-third of its present cost. My remarks were not directed at all toward the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest that there is nothing before the House. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] wants to reinsert that clause, he can do it, but let us get down to business.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I shall when the proper time comes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This is not the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Clerk: For Clerk of the House of Representatives, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund, $5,000; hire of horses and wagons and cartage for use of the Clerk's office, $900, or so much thereof as may be necessary; chief clerk, journal clerk, and two reading clerks, at $3,600 each; tally clerk, $3,000; file clerk, $2,750; printing and bill clerk, disbursing clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $2,500 each; distributing clerk, $2,250; docket clerk, assistant disbursing clerk, assistant enrolling clerk, resolution and petition clerk, printing and document clerk, index clerk, assistant journal clerk, stationery clerk, and assistant to chief clerk, at $2,000 each; librarian and superintendent clerks document room, at $1,800 each; one bookkeeper, two assistant librarians, and seven clerks, at $1,600 each; document and bill clerk, $1,600; document clerk, $1,440; locksmith, who shall be skilled in his trade, $1,200; one assistant in Clerk's office, and one assistant in disbursing office, at $1,400 each; assistant index clerk, $1,500; telegraph operator, assistant file clerk, and stenographer to the Clerk, at $1,200 each; assistant telegraph operator authorized and named in resolution adopted January 15, 1902, $1,200; one assistant in library, one assistant in document room, one assistant in stationery room, and one messenger in file room, at $900 each; one page, $720; attendant in charge of bathroom, $1,000; three laborers in the bathroom, at $720 each; three laborers, page in enrolling room, and janitor in the library, at $720 each; messenger in chief clerk's office, $900; in all, $98,720.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, in line 9, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "Allowance to chief clerk for stenographic and typewriting services, $250."

In line 10 strike out the words "seven hundred and fifty" and insert the words "nine hundred and seventy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Insert, on page 13, line 3, after the word "messenger," the following: "Three cabinetmakers who shall be skilled in their trade, one at $1,200 and two at $900 each."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that is subject to the point of order, and I make the point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not authorized by law. It is a new service not existing under the Clerk of the House. There is no such service now in existence.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state first why I offered it at this time. It is because of the information that I had from the Superintendent of the Capitol that his only objection to these cabinetmakers is that they were under his supervision and not under an officer of the House who has to do with that matter.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, has the point of order been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from New York has made the point of order, and will be glad to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there is any resolution of the House or other authority for the appointment of the employees named in the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I will state it is in the existing law, under the bill which passed last year, and has been the existing law for several years, and having passed in that shape, this is an effort to eliminate it and change existing law under this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no resolution or other authority except as found in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no resolution or any authority except that found in the last appropriation bill, where no such service is connected with the office of the Clerk of the House as the gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to include here now.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been repeatedly held that the mere fact that a similar office was appropriated for in a previous appropriation bill is not to be considered as existing law so as to authorize another appropriation for another year. It is not a law authorizing an appropriation for a subsequent year. Unless there is some resolution or some authority outside of the mere appropriation for the pay in a former bill the Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry. Then I understand the Chair will rule the same way if I shall offer this amendment under the head of the appropriation for the Superintendent of the Capitol and grounds?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to so rule unless some authority of law shall be shown for the creation of the office and the appropriation of the money.

The Clerk read as follows:

To continue during the fiscal year 1907 the employment of three clerks, at $1,600 each, in the office of the Clerk of the House, to complete a digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Fifty-second to the Fifty-seventh Congress, inclusive, $4,800.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 11 to 17, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out the paragraph just read, which is embraced in the lines 11 to 17, inclusive.

Mr. JOHNSON. This provides for indexing private claims that have been introduced from the Fifty-first to the Fifty-seventh Congress. When the resolution passed this House providing that these claims should be indexed, I thought, and I have no doubt other Members thought, the purpose of the resolution was to get the claims which were pending before Congress in concise and compact form as a book of reference. The testimony taken before the Appropriations Committee shows that this force of clerks has been working for three years, but they already have compiled sufficient data for eight or ten large volumes, and they say that it will take them another year to complete it, and when it is completed it will be a work as large as an encyclopedia, that nobody on earth will have. They have not only taken private claims which were in contemplation of Congress when the index was provided for, but they have gone and taken all the private pension bills and included them as private claims. The Clerk of the House testified before the committee that it will make a volume so large that he would never want one, and he did not think anybody else would. It not only involves an unnecessary expense to compile these so-called "indexes," but it will involve a very large expense to have those worthless things printed after they are compiled. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me from the evidence I have read, as it was disclosed before the Appropriations Committee, that it is merely a waste of money, and I make the motion, and the House can do as it pleases with that motion.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state that the Committee on Appropriations did not have to consider whether such legislation and such work was proper or not. Probably if it had had the determination of it with the information now before us we would not have approved the beginning of such work; but the work has been going on for three years and an expense of probably $20,000 has been incurred. The compilation is practically on cards and now is to be recast in order to be put in such shape as will make it ready for the printer. The work is so far along that we feel it incumbent upon us to provide for the continuance and completion of the work. A year ago we added these words: "To complete this service."

Mr. JOHNSON. But they did not complete it?

Mr. LITTAUER. They did not complete it. The men in charge of the work came before us and showed us that they had 248,000 or 250,000 entries, and that it could not be completed last year by the number of clerks devoted to it. They believe that they could complete it in the coming year. It would then practically be in a shape that Congress could determine whether it was to be printed or not, and how great the expense connected therewith would be. I agree with the gentleman about this service. I do not believe it will bring a return equivalent to its cost; but it has already gone on so far, and it is nearly done, that it should be completed. This year ought to complete it, and if it does not, I do not believe we will be here asking an appropriation to finish it up next year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Right in that connection——

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does not the gentleman believe, on the evidence before his committee, that the work is absolutely worthless?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no opinion to give. The House itself ordered that this work be done, and the House ought to be the best judge of whether it should be completed or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I remember when the resolution passed the House, and I do not believe that there is a Member of the House who contemplated that it would be anything but an index in concise form, giving the history of the claims pending for legislation.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no doubt that was the idea when Congress authorized the work, but Congress evidently did not comprehend the scope of the work they ordered, and the legislation was not specific enough in detailing how it should be performed; and the work has been nearly completed on the exact lines of former digests.

Mr. BURLESON. It is completed up to the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is but little yet to compile, and it seems to me that it ought to be completed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied that it will never be printed; and what is the use of us paying this $4,800 a year?

Mr. LITTAUER. If it is not printed, we will have the card index of it anyhow.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit me, since this discussion has begun respecting this index, it has occurred to me that this index of claims could be made to be of great value to the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims in ascertaining the history of those claims. Would it not be possible, by an amendment to the item, to provide for throwing away the cards on the pension matter before they are printed?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no authorization for printing. It will take another year to complete. The work has been completed to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and it seems to me that the extra expense would be so trifling that we might as well complete the work on the lines on which it was begun, now practically 75 or 80 per cent completed.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This question was inspired by a question of a colleague on this floor, and it struck me with some force, with 6,900 pension bills, and possibly having a greater number hereafter, that it might be of interest to the members of the Committee on Claims or the Committee on War Claims. I do not think it should include those pension claims.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think it would have been well to limit exactly what this digest should contain, but it is practically finished now.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think it would be of some value to the Claims Committees, but not to the individual member.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think it will be of value to attorneys of claimants and those seeking information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri for a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you not think it would be a good thing to put in some kind of a proviso at the end of this proposition that these men shall complete this business under this appropriation?

Mr. LITTAUER. The appropriation reads "to complete the digest."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but these men will not complete it this side of the day of judgment.

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems that we have provided for it as well as we could by words.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You can surely put words in the bill for them to complete this work under this appropriation. If you do not do it it is going to take precisely the form of this remarkable aggregation of talent down here, appointed to codify the laws of the United States, and they entered on a general scheme of legislation for the United States.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman suggest to me the language?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would put in these words: "Provided, This work shall be completed by the end of the fiscal year 1907."

Mr. LITTAUER. I will agree to such an amendment, if the gentleman from Missouri will only show me how it can have any practical result. We appropriate for these salaries and they are paid monthly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Make their drawing the salary depend upon the finishing this work. If you do not you will be exactly in the same box at this time next year.

Mr. LITTAUER. Pay them no salary until the end of the year?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, certainly; let them know what the result will be and they will go to work.

Mr. LITTAUER. We want to have this finished during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. BURLESON. I suggest that it can be done by adding after the word "complete" the words "at the end of the fiscal year 1907."

Mr. JOHNSON. I think a better amendment would be:

Provided, That no part of this money shall be paid until the work is completed.

We do not get our pay before we do our work.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, this work was authorized in the first place by the House. We have appropriated this amount of money to complete it. Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri would be simply this: That these men must do twelve months' work on wind and water. They can not do it. Therefore the practical result of his amendment, if adopted, means the cutting off of this work now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think there is any imminent danger of these three distinguished men resigning if you put in that provision?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They certainly will not work.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then they certainly would not get any pay, and that is exactly what I should like to see done.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We had better just strike it out then and be done with it. That is a fair, open way of doing business; but if we adopt this proposition, which would compel them to do twelve months' work without any pay, every Member on this floor knows that the men who are doing this work would stop now. Let the House deal fairly and honestly with itself. If you do not want this work to proceed and to be finished, then strike it out of the bill; but if you want it finished as we have provided for, then give these men something to eat and a place to sleep while they are doing the work. That is all there is in it.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit a suggestion?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I want to get the floor in my own right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield first to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. The obstacle the gentleman suggests can be overcome by inserting in the bill "provided that 30 per cent" or "25 per cent" or some per cent "of each month's salary shall be retained until the completion of this work."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. I want to get the floor in my own right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In a moment. That proposition would not help you at all. It is a question whether they receive more than they absolutely need to live on or not in their salaries. We do not know that. If the gentleman from Texas will assert that 30 per cent could be taken from their salaries and still enable them to go on and do this work, I have no objection to it, but that is not an open way of doing business. Let us get at it and be fair about it and either appropriate for the doing of the work or strike it out, one or the other.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no knowledge of who these three men are. I do not know whether they are competent to do this work or not. I assume they are, and they have been appointed by the proper officer of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest to the gentleman that their work up to this time has been good.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest that this work may be very valuable for the information of the House. At present there is no way by which a Member of the House not a member of one of the Committees on Claims can get at the knowledge of the merits of any claim. It has been the custom of these committees to report only the bills upon which they decide favorably. When they vote down a bill they never bring in an adverse report in the House. I think that has been so from the Fifty-second Congress down to the Fifty-seventh, inclusive. Time was, formerly, when sometimes committees reported these bills adversely and put on the record the facts which authorized the adverse report, but now these claims are put into a pigeonhole. They are introduced Congress after Congress and pigeonholed again and again. By and by they get into a report, and the report is presented to the House; but the House has no knowledge whatever concerning the claim, except what is contained in the favorable report made to the House.

Now, I notice the provision is here to make an index, to complete a digest and summary and alphabetical list of private claims for the use of the House. That word "summary" may involve a good deal and it may not involve much. If it is thoroughly and honestly and fairly done, it ought to present to the Members of the House briefly the facts in each case, so that when these claims come in reported by the committee, the House can get the information in regard to each one of them; and if any facts exist which show a reason why the claim should not be passed, they can be presented from this summary to the House and a defense be made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be an end to the time when this is going to be done?

Mr. PAYNE. Of course there ought to be. But if we do not furnish them a salary—something to live on—they can not progress and work toward that end. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the work is well done it will save the Treasury of the United States far more than the $4,800 a year for the clerks of these gentlemen. If it is not thoroughly done, of course the work will be worthless.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We are not objecting to this $4,800, but we are objecting to the prospect of $4,800, year after year, without any limit.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know who these gentlemen are. I have no interest in any one of them. I have an interest in seeing that the Treasury of the United States is not called upon to pay dishonest claims, as the House well knows. While the committee do not report adversely, I have understood from the two committees that they were going to do so, but I have not seen one adverse report yet; but the House ought to have some machinery by which Members of the House can find out about these claims when they come here for discussion, so that we could pass upon them intelligently.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment to strike out the paragraph, and I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following: "Provided, That 30 per cent of each monthly payment shall be withheld until the work shall have been completed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think that is well considered and would meet the purpose that the gentleman has in view. The actual state of things in this matter is that the work of compilation has already been completed, and the men are now busy assembling these various cards under various categories. We provide that they shall have the salary they have been paid for the last few years to complete this work during the coming year. To simply hold back 30 per cent of their salary until the work shall have been completed perhaps might carry with it a continuance of the 70 per cent of salary until the work was completed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was not the promise made to the Appropriations Committee a year ago that this work would be completed when you gave them $4,800 more?

Mr. LITTAUER. Positively so. We anticipated that it would be completed by the 1st of the next July when the current year's appropriation runs out.

Mr. JOHNSON. And now they come back and want an appropriation of $4,800 for another year, and unless we do something to spur them on to get this work done one year from now they will be back asking for $4,800 more.

Mr. LITTAUER. Let me explain to the gentleman. We had before us one of these three clerks. He was a very intelligent man, answered our questions with full information, and he stated that a year ago when the statement was made that the digest could be completed within a year it was made by his superior officer. He was not before us; he knew that the work of writing up could be done by the 1st of next July, but as to the complete compilation ready for the printer he knew that could not be done. Then Mr. BRICK, of the committee, was very particular to inquire of him: "I understand you to say that it will take another year to complete the work; you mean the year from next July?" "Yes." "At that time it will be ready to print in document form?" "Yes, I think so; that is my best judgment."

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; and a year from now some other Member will come before your committee and say he is not bound by what that clerk said and that that clerk was mistaken.

Mr. LITTAUER. The character of the work is worthy of the compensation paid. If we are going to keep these men at this work—and we believe that they are not simply marking time, but are trying to complete it—they would naturally be entitled to such compensation as they previously had. I hardly feel that the committee ought to adopt the amendment and reserve 30 per cent from their pay when there is no evidence that the men are not properly carrying out the work to the best of their ability.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of completing this colossal work as an illustration of the supreme folly, I might say, of attempting to legislate on private claims at all, in attempting to settle them here. This work finished will demonstrate that our system of paying private claims by special acts is a failure, and has been throughout the history of the Government—that honest claims fail to be paid, and fraudulent ones are liable to get through. There is hardly a State in the Union, with a very small fraction of claims compared to those that are presented against the United States, that would tolerate for a single year any such absurd system of paying claims by private acts. The system works injustice to the honest claimant and gives room for the dishonest to work in his claim. We can pass no statute of limitation here against our own work. We will not obey our own limitation. There is an old report made by the War Claims Committee to this House that sets forth a number of these dishonest claims, and, as an illustration, I think I can give the figures substantially as to one of them. There was a Florida war claim that arose in 1838. It was originally presented for $13,000, and in the Forty-fifth Congress there was a bill to finish up paying that claim for $50,000, after thirty-odd thousand dollars had been paid on the original claim. We have other illustrations like that. My idea is that we ought to have this report finished in order that we may lay it before the House to prove that we should not resort to a system of settling claims not founded on law and which can not be audited in the Departments. I am in favor of amending the Constitution so that all this class of claims can be settled in the courts, and to furnish a court always open for claimants. Then we can have a statute of limitations that will end them. Congress should be relieved of jurisdiction over such claims. Many of the claimants have been ruined because they have stayed year by year trying to get their claims through. They have wasted their means in trying to do what was impossible. This report, when it is made, will show the great folly of our trying here to adjudicate claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, the gentleman knows that a great many of these people go into the courts and get judgment for all they are entitled to, and the judgment is then paid, and that then they come again to Congress for additional pay.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted that the distinguished gentleman has made that suggestion, because it is one of the things that I wanted to speak about. I am very thankful for it. Some of these claims are allowed and some are disallowed, and in either case they come back here always; but under my plan, which I shall ask this House to pass upon, we are to have a court, and when a claim goes through it it will be as completely settled as in any case adjudicated in any court in this country. We shall have a statute of limitations applying to the court that will be effective. We can not have a statute of limitations that is effective as against ourselves.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have gathered from this discussion that the trouble with this work, the evil of the work, is that it is going to be greatly impaired by the inclusion in the digest of all the multiplied thousands of private pension bills, and that they will bury up the real bills that we want information about so that it is impossible almost to extricate them. Is it not possible to provide before this work is finally published for the elimination of the private pension bills and the grouping together and bringing in in a more compact form of the histories of the digest of the several claims bills, which will be regarded as of great importance to the Congress and to the country? Can that not be done?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. I did not know that pension claims were being indexed by these clerks. I do not think that is wise, but we ought to have all these claims indexed and digested and brought here for the protection of the Government.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] was the one that I was trying to give to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.

KEIFER]. That will take care of the expenses, but the amendment now before the House is an extraordinary process. It is out of the lines of legislation as we conduct it in this House. It is the first time in the history of the House, I think, that a clerk's salary or the salary of an official has been doled out to him so much per month and so much kept back. It is not the proper way to do business. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] has no idea, perhaps, of the condition of these men and the doing of this work. I don't know whether they can live with 30 per cent deducted from this salary and held back to the end of the work, nor does he. The extravagance, if any exists, will come in the publication, but not in this work, and this House has perfect control over that question. When we come to publish the work we can eliminate from it all the pension cases and we can eliminate anything else that we please. The effort of the gentleman now is inopportune; it is not the proper place to act, and it is not the time to act. If these men are worthy of their hire we ought to pay it to them.

Mr. JAMES. How much has been expended already to pay these men?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We have expended $4,800 a year for three years, and we propose to spend that now. The committee, Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee at least, was entirely satisfied that this work could and would be completed within a year from next July. We hesitated about the appropriation, but when we were satisfied that this work would be completed by that time, then we put in the appropriation, and not until then.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. Does the gentleman from Georgia think that it is an extraordinary proceeding and a harsh proceeding to require a man to do his work before he gets his pay?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, let us see how that sounds, Mr. Chairman. Suppose the gentleman's salary of $5,000 was held back—25 or 40 per cent of it—on his fulfilling all of his duties, for the term of two years, what would he think of it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That ought to be the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON. Ought to be held back until you earned it?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Perhaps you would never earn it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then that is all right; then let them send some one here who would.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, suppose you put that on the President, suppose you put that on the Congressmen—that is not the way to get a man to do his duty. If a man does not do his duty, discharge him. These clerks could be discharged to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. If three men were to come to you to build a house and told you they could finish it in twelve months for $4,800, would you pay them one-twelfth of that a month or hold part of it back until the work was completed?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, that would be according to the contract entered into.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to make a contract with these people.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We have already made a contract with them.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; you have not. Their contract with the Government will expire the 30th day of next June. They are before your committee saying in twelve months for $4,800 they can complete this work, and I want to make a contract with them beginning the 1st day of July that will make them do it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman a question in turn. Let us see how he stands on it. Take this house business. They have gone on and completed it and there is only one-tenth of the work yet to do. They have done all except just putting on the roof and putting on the little frills and furbelows around the house, and he says because they have not done it as the contract originally provided he will stop the house and let it rot down. That is his proposition to stop this business and lose the money that has been spent.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JAMES. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. You say in this item here, "to complete a digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims;" you declare in that item it is the purpose to "complete this work," and yet after you have made that declaration you object to a limitation being placed upon it providing for the completion of the alphabetical and summary digest which you say you intended to do. That is a peculiar anomaly to present to the House here. You say you want to complete it and your purpose is to complete it, and when a man provides a limitation that they shall not collect unless they do so, you say you do not stand for that sort of legislation. Now, what is the objection to a limitation here saying these men shall not be paid unless they do what the committee says they have to do, and that is, complete this work?

Mr. LITTAUER. You suggest, however, such a limitation as is entirely of a different order of limitation from what is ever placed upon compensation for clerical services. Here are just three clerks working at this piece of compilation. Now, why should we particularly say, "Your salaries will not be paid to you until you complete this work, and it must be completed this year?" These clerks are carrying out this work under the supervision of the Clerk of the House. The real economy, as I believe, would be to declare to these men, "Complete this work; get it together;" then before we proceed to the expense of printing, which will cost an amount quite equal to all the expense of compilation, determine whether or not the digest is worthy of being printed, and also whether the work can not be procured elsewhere.

Mr. JAMES. I will answer the question by asking you one. Why not say "in furtherance of the work" instead of "completion?"

Mr. LITTAUER. Because we want to use the word "completion," believing thereby we could force the work to completion.

Mr. JAMES. That is why we want to limit them.

Mr. LITTAUER. Ours is by moral suasion, and yours is by a limitation upon salaries.

Mr. JAMES. How many times have these gentlemen promised they would complete the work?

Mr. LITTAUER. Never before.

Mr. JAMES. How long have they been at it?

Mr. LITTAUER. They have been occupied for three years.

Mr. JAMES. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that two good men could have done this work in one year's time?

Mr. LITTAUER. I understand that; and I will ask the gentleman's opinion of it.

Mr. JAMES. And when you provide that the work shall be done by the end of the fiscal year or no pay will be allowed, don't you know that they will go to work and finish it? If no limitation is fixed upon the salary next Congress will find the work unfinished.

Mr. LITTAUER. In this instance I do not believe that the statement of the gentleman is correct.

Mr. JAMES. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. LITTAUER. Entirely so.

Mr. JAMES. You admit it ought to have been completed?

Mr. LITTAUER. The work has been thoroughly done, and I think the men have done what looks like diligent clerical service.

Mr. JAMES. If it is completed what good would it be to the people? You said that you did it for the purpose of pushing them on.

Mr. LITTAUER. Because we want to get rid of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long do they propose to work on this index before it is complete?

Mr. LITTAUER. The statement that we have before the committee is that they will complete it within the year for which we are now appropriating.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When do they say they will complete it?

Mr. LITTAUER. If you will turn to the hearings, on page 13 of the hearings, we asked this clerk to state how long it would take, in his best judgment, to complete. The question was asked by Mr. BRICK: "And at that time it will be ready to print in the document?" Mr. Hunsicker answered: "Yes, sir; I think so. That is my best judgment."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does the gentleman himself think about it?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think they ought to be able to do it, but I am not sufficiently familiar with that character of work to determine.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What objection have you to putting in a limitation, so that it must be done by that time?

Mr. LITTAUER. I feel that it ought to be done, but I do not think we should be called upon to say that to three clerks.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not?

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you think it is a proper thing to say to these three clerks of the House, "If you do not do this work by the end of the year, $3,000 of your salaries shall be deducted?" It does not seem to me a right and fair system.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But you know it does mean that we are going to compel the completion of the work in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. JAMES. I was just discussing with one of my colleagues which one of these gentlemen took me off the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JAMES. I do not know that I want five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JAMES. I want the gentleman from New York to answer one question only, and that is this: You say that we ought not to provide that these gentlemen shall not receive any money unless they complete this work. What is your objection to this provision being limited in this way: Say $4,800 of the amount appropriated for the completion of the work. If these gentlemen do not want to do it, then other people can take it up. Have you any objection to that?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. JAMES. All right; then I will prepare the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JAMES. I do.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman has fallen into a general mistake, and some others have followed him. There is no provision in this bill for the employment of clerks to contract to do this work. This is a provision for the Clerk of this House to employ clerks to do this work. If you will turn back to line 23, page 11, it begins with, "For Clerk of the House of Representatives," etc. Then here, among other things, comes, under the head of "Clerk," "to continue during the fiscal year 1907 the employment of three clerks at $1,600 each," etc. The point I make is this: Whether the gentleman wants to put a limitation upon the employment or upon the period for the completion of the work?

Mr. JAMES. I want to put a limitation upon the time for the completion of this work.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized for a moment in my own right.

Mr. JAMES. I will prepare the amendment and send it up.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that authority for the doing of this work was given by the Congress of the United States.

It was Congress that authorized this work to be done. The Committee on Appropriations since that time has been making the necessary appropriations for the purpose of carrying on the work which Congress has authorized. Now, this work has been deemed by Congress to be of sufficient importance to have it done thoroughly and well; and in order to ascertain whether it was being done in accordance with the will of Congress, the committee, for the first time, called before it the men who are doing the work, interrogated them carefully as to whether they were doing it as expeditiously as it is possible to do it, and after a thorough investigation came to the conclusion that it can and will be completed during the next fiscal year. Therefore we continued the appropriation and put in this limitation. Now, the idea of attempting to withhold a part of the compensation for the purpose of compelling it to be done seems to me to be rather a harsh proposition, in view of the fact that in the judgment of the committee these men are doing this work as rapidly as it is possible for them to do it.

I find in the document room Senate Document No. 3, Fifty-ninth Congress, which is a digest of all the claims presented to the Senate. The Senate has done this work, so far as its body is concerned, covering a period from November 9, 1903, to March 4, 1905.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long were they doing that work?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many clerks worked at it?

Mr. TAWNEY. The work commenced November, 1903, and continued to March 4, 1905. Now, the House commenced the work in 1902, and we intend to include the claims presented to the Fifty-eighth Congress. The work is much larger in the House, because the number of claims is greater.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much did they pay the clerks, and how long did they work?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not able to answer the gentleman; but if he will send to the document room and get Senate Document No. 3, he will see the work which they did. I have just seen the document myself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me have it and I will look at it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The work which these men are preparing will make two volumes, each volume almost twice the size of this volume. We had the old volumes before us, we have that volume before us, and that is the estimate that each volume will be at least twice as large as this. The work is more than double the work which has been done by the Senate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. These men have been working at this in the House for several years, according to my recollection.

Mr. TAWNEY. They will complete it this coming fiscal year, without any doubt, in my judgment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Without any doubt?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me from the reading of this proposed appropriation that this is going to be a permanent job. Now, this appropriation is made for what purpose? To complete a digest and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Fifty-second to the Fifty-seventh Congress. If they do all that is asked of them they will only complete the claims presented up to and including the Fifty-seventh Congress. The Fifty-eighth Congress claims will be left over, and a year from next July the Fifty-ninth Congress will have passed into history. Therefore, there will be the claims of two more Congresses to digest and tabulate, and by the time that is done other Congresses will have come and gone and the job will be continuous. So we should either discontinue this or let them have the pay from year to year, and treat this as an appropriation which must be made from year to year.

Mr. LITTAUER. It can only be continued by the specific authorization of Congress.

Mr. DRISCOLL. You want a digest that is up to date, and unless that is done it will be of little use. If it is worth printing as a book of reference, you will need an annual digest keeping the work up to date, and that will mean an annual appropriation.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, referring to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that there ought to be adverse reports on claims that are rejected by the Claims and War Claims Committees, it seems to me proper that some statement should be made in regard to the work of the Committee on Claims. The published rules of that committee will show that at each meeting the roll is called, and each member of the committee is permitted to call up for consideration one bill, provided his name is reached on the roll call.

Now, of course, bills are frequently presented that excite considerable controversy in the committee, create a good deal of discussion, and take much time for consideration, so that it is unusual to get to each man each time. There are perhaps a thousand bills referred to the Committee on Claims. It results, of course, that not all of these bills can possibly be reached in a session, since the committee meets but once a week, and accordingly each member of the committee desires in his time to call up some bill that has been favorably reported by his subcommittee in order to have a bill that will perhaps be favorably acted upon by the whole body. For lack of time, bills that are adversely acted upon by the subcommittee are not called up, simply because to call up for consideration and action a bill which he recommends adversely deprives some just claim which he might otherwise report of consideration. It is not because the committee has any objection to reporting them adversely; it is, in fact, the sense of the committee that bills which are not considered just ought to be reported adversely. This has been discussed in the Committee on Claims, of which I happen to be a member, but they are not called up for the simple reason that there is a lack of time to do it, if we would act on the just claims.

I shall myself suggest, near the close of the session and after the time has passed for getting bills on the Calendar for practical purposes, that we devote some time to making adverse reports on the bills which we reject, so as to have them out of the way next session.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], who just read from the Senate report, I want now to read him the Senate provision which ordered this Senate work done. Among other things this Senate law provides:

> Said work shall be completed and reported to the Senate on the first day of the first regular session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and the usual number of copies shall be printed and ready for distribution on said date.

There is a positive limitation as to the time of the completion of this work—that it shall be completed at a certain date, and they are to pay $1,200 for the work.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the provision of law authorizing the House to do this work?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will read it right here.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say the House, not the Senate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The objection I have is this bill puts no limitation on these clerks.

Mr. TAWNEY. The House is not authorizing this work to be done in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, why do you not put a limitation on these clerks like the Senate did? They did so and got the work done on time.

Mr. TAWNEY. We are not authorizing the work to be done in this bill; we are not appropriating to carry out the work that Congress has already authorized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We are appropriating and of course can limit the use of the funds. Why not have the House limit this work in some such way as the Senate has limited this—"said work shall be completed and reported to the Senate on the first day of the first regular session of the Fifty-ninth Congress?" Now, here is the Senate work completed. This matter was ordered done last Congress, and here, March 13, 1905, it is printed and here it is completed and ready for use.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman has only read a portion of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will read the whole of it if the gentleman wishes. The work is similar.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to know whether the Senate authorized the Secretary to do the work and have it done in a certain time, or made an appropriation for so much for the purpose of initiating and carrying out the work of that kind over a period of several years. The gentleman must remember that the Senate report only covers two Congresses. Now, when this work was authorized was it with any degree of definiteness as to how long it would take to complete it? We do not know how long it will take with any certainty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We ought to put a limitation in when this work shall be completed. Here we allow so much money to complete the work, but omit to say it must, by a certain day, be "complete." The Senate did and got the work done on time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand we are employing three clerks at $1,600 each, and the committee says they are worth it. They say they can complete the work in a year, but suppose they be mistaken, are we to mulct them in the sum of $500 after they have done their very best to complete the work and have rendered a full equivalent—to impose a penalty upon them because of a mistake in the amount of work and the time to do it in?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; but I do not see why we should not put in this reasonable limitation; I do not see why we should not. We should have the work done by a certain time. If they should come here and say that they faithfully worked eight or ten hours a day during the year and that they were unable to complete the work, why, this splendid committee would excuse them. I would.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This committee informs the House——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will excuse me for a moment, as it is these gentlemen can go on ad infinitum to "complete" this work.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Committee on Appropriations informs the House that these men have worked industriously and done the best they could. They are not soldiering, and I think we have a right to assume that they will do the best they can during the next year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is nothing rash, nothing irregular, nothing immoral in putting a limitation on this work. The chairman of the committee says it can be completed in the next year; we have his word for it, and why do we not say so literally, as the Senate has, and get the work done? I am going to support some such proposition as that the Senate made.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the completion of a digest, summary, and alphabetical list of private claims——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will suspend. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that there is an amendment already pending. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK of Missouri) there were—ayes 17, noes 66.

So the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph and insert the following:

"For the completion of a digest, summary, and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Fifty-second Congress to the Fifty-seventh Congress, inclusive, $4,800."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, is it proper to offer an amendment to the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I offer the following amendment: After the words "private claims" insert the words "exclusive of private pension claims," and I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he has any objection to that?

Mr. JAMES. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, there surely can be no sense whatever in cluttering up this digest of claims with a history of sixty-odd thousand private pension claims. When a pension claim is disposed of nobody ever wants to hear of it again. So I think that amendment surely ought to be adopted to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman realize that this compilation has already been made, and they are simply gathering it together?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but that would shorten up the work of gathering it together.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that it is already gathered together.

Mr. BRICK. They are all on the same card.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky will be withdrawn. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that this is a lump-sum appropriation to complete this work under the amendment now offered. The appropriation is not under the control of the House at all, and I submit that it accomplishes absolutely nothing, that the appropriation which is made in the bill will complete the work, and the salaries will be paid as provided for by Congress. You give to the Clerk of the House the authority under this provision of fixing the compensation to be paid employees of the House. There is only that difference between this proposition and the language of the bill.

Mr. JAMES. But does the gentleman from Minnesota believe that the Clerk of the House would use any more of this money than would be necessary?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know. I do not think he would.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman not think that the House could repose as much confidence in the Clerk as we could in the gentlemen employed to do the work at stipulated salaries?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is entirely inconsistent with the policy of the House to turn over lump-sum appropriations to any officer of the House and to allow him to expend it as he pleases.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not more consistent than to turn it over to individuals and allow them to prolong their jobs? I understood the gentleman in charge of the bill to be willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that when the proposition was first made to me I felt that some such limitation ought to be made. The only trouble is that the Clerk of the House could then continue to engage three or more men at similar compensation to that formerly paid, and when the sum of $4,800 was exhausted he could simply come back to the House and say to us that in order to complete that work he had paid out the $4,800, and that it was only half completed.

Mr. JAMES. I do not think the Clerk would do that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Suppose he would say he could not comprehend how much money it would take to complete the work?

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the gentleman that I think he would complete the work within the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 31, noes 44.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky demands tellers. All those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] More than a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] will take their places as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 17, page 13, add: "Provided, That said work shall be completed on or before June 30, 1907."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds: For chief engineer, $1,700; three assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; six conductors of elevators, at $1,200 each, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds; two laborers, at $820 each; six firemen, at $900 each; electrician, $1,200; laborer, $1,000; three laborers, at $720 each; and for the following for service in old library portion of the Capitol: Two attendants, at $1,500 each; watchman, $900; in all, $27,800.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the increase of pay to the elevator men provided for in line 22. I desire to remark, Mr. Chairman, that this bill seems to be full of increases of salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state the point of order to the particular paragraph that has been made?

Mr. HARDWICK. There are different items in this paragraph. I raise the point of order to the provision respecting the pay of elevator men in line 22, being an increase of $100 a year over the amount carried in previous appropriation bills; and under the uniform rulings of all Speakers and presiding officers this point of order is well taken.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would state for the information of the gentleman that the salaries of elevator conductors by resolution of this House in 1888 were placed at $1,200. The Committee on Appropriations uniformly, beginning two years thereafter, included in this bill their salaries at $1,100, but each successive Congress, from that time down, has increased that salary by $100. Our attention was called to this matter by the Committee on Accounts, who recommended that the salary be placed at $1,200 instead of $1,100, as carried in the legislative bill for years, in order that what has been indirectly done for many years may be directly done in the future. The elevator conductors have received since 1888 $1,200 a year, and it is simply to do away with the duplication, that mandate of the House repeatedly given to the Committee on Appropriations, that in this one instance we inserted the salary which by resolution these men have received for so many Congresses.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. I yield.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if this additional $100 a year provided for in this appropriation is now to take the place of the usual extra month?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; not at all. They have had the $1,200 and the one month extra. It is to take the place of the resolution which each Congress is reported by the Committee on Accounts increasing their salaries $100.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I would like to ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee how he explains the discrepancy between the salary of the chief engineer of the Senate end of the Capitol and that of the chief engineer at our end of the Capitol?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a point of order now on another matter, but for the information of the gentleman I will state there is no explanation to be given except it is the wish of the Senate to have their engineer given $2,100 and it is our wish that our engineer should be recompensed $1,700.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him why three or four weeks ago there were forty elevators stopped in the public buildings throughout the country? I was at the Department and was told they did not have money to run them. I then came to the House and I protested, and four or five days after that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] informed me he had gone to the Treasury office and stirred up a little caloric possibly, and that the elevators would be started in a few days, and they were so started. Now, why were they stopped in my city and thirty-nine other places and why started again?

Mr. LITTAUER. It involves a mere matter of administration. The Secretary of the Treasury, or one of the subordinates, must have ordered them stopped. They came to us and asked for an extra sum in a deficiency bill, or at least they wanted a larger sum of money to carry on that service, and we said, "Oh, no; we believe you have enough; we believe we have given you enough, and if you adopted proper economy you could have gotten along with what was given." After that some elevators were stopped throughout the country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They stopped forty, amongst others one at Nashville, and started them again a few days after the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. LITTAUER. Perhaps they found they had some other appropriation.

Mr. PALMER. Why did not the gentleman make a fuss about it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did make a fuss, and I made such an intelligent fuss that they started in a very few days. I have been surprised that that great Department should have summarily stopped forty elevators for want of funds and then abruptly started them again.

Mr. PALMER. So you jumped on them?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Whenever they do wrong and my people call it to my attention I am going to jump on them, and I will jump on a Democrat quicker than on a Republican, because everybody expects a Democrat to do right all the time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say that I am obliged to make the point of order, so as to be consistent, and I will make it on every single item of this bill where an increase is made. I hope the House will oppose this thing of giving extra pay to employees in this way.

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you believe that this is the best way?

Mr. HARDWICK. This is but one of the number of increases that have been put upon this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. We do it here every year.

Mr. HARDWICK. Do you believe that this is a proper way to legislate year by year and adding to the various salaries by resolution? I want the people all to know what the House is doing by its action in this way.

Mr. LITTAUER. But we do let you know. If the gentleman had devoted himself to a consideration of our report he would have seen plainly how this has been done. A little diligence would have made it very manifest to him.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe I have manifested sufficient diligence to know this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule on the point of order. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to say that there is some authority of law for a salary at $1,200 a year. The Chair would like to be informed distinctly what it was.

Mr. LITTAUER. As I have it in the memorandum from the Committee on Accounts to the Committee on Appropriations, the salary of the House elevator conductor was fixed at $1,200 a year by resolution of the House on December 21, 1881.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And it has been that ever since.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that by the resolution of the House under which this position was originally created, the compensation or salary was fixed at $1,200 a year?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume that to be sufficient authority for the creation and continuance of that position, and the fact that Congress may in subsequent years have appropriated a less amount than $1,200 does not seem to the Chair to be a change of that law. It has often been ruled that Congress may, without changing existing law, either withhold an appropriation entirely or appropriate a less amount than is authorized. It may be a close question, but the Chair thinks that a previous resolution adopted some years ago and not modified by any subsequent action is sufficient authority for the salary of $1,200, within the spirit and intent of Rule XXI. The fact that the last Congress did not appropriate the full amount does not change the situation nor the law.

An appropriation of a less sum than the amount fixed by law for the salary of an officer is not a change of law. (Parliamentary Precedents, House of Representatives, sec. 546.)

The Chair therefore holds that there is authority for the appropriation of $1,200, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I make the point of order against the provision, in line 24, on page 13, for two laborers at $820 each. Only one laborer was provided for heretofore, and therefore one of them is subject to the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the Chair just now to rule, in that ruling about the elevator, that a resolution which allowed $1,200 for the elevator men, gave the Appropriations Committee the right to increase the salary. Now, if it is $1,300 a year, is not that a change of existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Chair did not make that ruling. The Chair ruled, in effect, that there being authority for the salary of $1,200 the appropriation for that amount is in order, although a previous Congress, not exercising its full authority, has appropriated only $1,100. An appropriation of $1,300, however, would be out of order as exceeding the authorized salary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the Chair will indulge me a moment further——

The CHAIRMAN. Another matter is now before us for consideration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was trying to get the Chair to give me further parliamentary information. I have not got it; but I will sit down if the Chair does not feel disposed to answer me further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought he had answered the gentleman's inquiry; but if he has not, the Chair will hear the gentleman further.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was trying to get, for further use, a ruling of the Chair upon this point: Is it a change of existing law of this House to increase the salary under the existing laws? That is the point.

The CHAIRMAN. When there is a law fixing a salary at a certain amount an amendment increasing it above that amount would probably be out of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to rule that way, and hence my inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Chair permit a remark further? Of course I know the point has passed, but the resolution that the gentleman from New York referred to provided for but one elevator man. I would like to know how it could be considered as covering six.

The CHAIRMAN. That point was not submitted to the Chair, and therefore was not passed upon.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to submit it to the Chair now.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Chair declined to let me make these points to all the items in the paragraph, and I was ready to make them all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made a point of order to a certain item in the paragraph. That paragraph was disposed of, and then the gentleman made a point of order to another item in the paragraph.

Mr. HARDWICK. I gave notice that I reserved all points of order to this paragraph; therefore it strikes me that the Chair is a little technical, to say the least of it.

Mr. LITTAUER. All points of order have been reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has submitted a point of order against the two laborers at $820. Upon that the Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LITTAUER. The laborers covered by this provision were carried in the appropriation bill for the current year—one of them at $720 and the other at $820. If the point of order will lie against this increase of salary to this one laborer, who, by the way, is a coal weigher, performing more intelligent work than laborers usually perform, and whom we believe should be compensated at a fair salary for his work, it would do so equally against practically every provision in connection with the service of the House. No reform can ever be made; we could have neither reduction nor advance in salary; and it seems to me that the position is wrong from the very foundation. The House has a right to choose its own officers, and that must include everyone in connection with the service about the House. Having a right to choose its own officers, it has a right to place their compensation at any rate the House may choose, and I do not believe this constitutional right can be limited by a previous Congress or by any rule that may be made in connection therewith. It seems to me to be a fundamental right pertaining to the House and all its officers. I therefore have concluded that the rule made applicable to current appropriation law, and which naturally applies throughout the Departments, can not properly apply to the official force connected with the House. That is a plain statement of the case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if the position taken by my colleague is sound, then the rules of the House are absolutely worthless.

Mr. LITTAUER. As far as the force of the House is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House has rules which particularly protect appropriation bills against legislation and against changes in existing law. Of course the House has the right to provide a force necessary for its work, and to provide compensation for that force; but this committee can not violate the rule of the House in providing the places, which rule says no appropriation shall be reported in any appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto except already authorized or in continuation of a public work in progress, and so forth, and that no provision changing existing law shall be in order upon an appropriation bill. In order to justify the Committee on Appropriations incorporating provisions for positions and salaries into the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill these positions must be in existence under the law, and the salaries attached thereto must be fixed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] is in error when he says that no reforms can be made. This committee can, if it ever will, refuse to appropriate the entire amount fixed by law, but it would not be able to appropriate in excess of the amount fixed by law for the particular service which is provided. The employees of this House have no particular advantage under the rules over the employees of any other Department of the Government when it comes to fixing their compensation in an appropriation bill. The House has protected itself against the greed and desire for patronage of its own Members, and unless by law, by some authority, a place is provided and the compensation is fixed, this committee can not, against a point of order, provide additional places or increase the compensation of any existing place.

I am not particularly interested in this question of the laborers any more than I was in the question of the compensation of the elevator men; but I will say at this time that I believe that the salaries paid to the elevator men employed in the service of the House can not be justified by any man in the House; $1,200 a year, with the extra $100 provided by the usual resolution, making $1,300 in all, is, in my judgment, very excessive compensation; but the House has shown that it will not reform in that respect, and I do not propose to attempt to do ungracious things that will be barren of results. But it is important that the point raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] be definitely settled, and in my judgment neither the Committee on Appropriations nor this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can insert into an appropriation bill provisions for employees of the House or increase compensation therefor not authorized by law if any Member interposes the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PALMER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4426. An act to amend section 927 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to insane criminals;

S. 4236. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Nebraska; and

S. 4350. An act for the relief of Arthur A. Underwood.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. MORGAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, just one suggestion in addition to that made by the gentleman from New York. As I understand, the way appropriations for Departments are determined in these bills is under section 169 of Title IV, which provides that each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks in the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers and laborers and other employees, and at such rates of compensation respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress. Now, I suppose that applies literally only to the Departments, and under that we are allowed to appropriate for clerks, and to raise the salaries of clerks anywhere from twelve hundred dollars up to eighteen hundred dollars. I have not been able, in a few minutes, to find anything which specifically applies this to Congress, but I suppose by analogy the same rule should be applied to Congressional appropriations, and that we shall have the same right here to increase the number of clerks, messengers, laborers, and so forth, as we have in the different Departments and to arrange their salaries according to the appropriations, and that that, in addition to the suggestions of the gentleman from New York, allows us to appropriate for additional laborers in the appropriation bills.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few observations on the point of order. It seems to me to be an exceptionally important question, and it involves a very important principle. It involves, in a way, the independence of the House of Representatives. Now, in my judgment, each legislative body, each member of the legislative branch of the Government, under the Constitution, has certain independent, individual powers and privileges. Each body is presumed to act independently of the other and independently of all other Departments of the Government. And in order that it may carry out its constitutional powers and privileges it must have an inherent right to do certain things that it may regard as essential to the performance of its proper functions.

Suppose it should be found that it is necessary for the House of Representatives to appoint certain officers for the administration of its work. Is it required to go to the Senate and the Executive for that permission? This appropriation involves a principle and a power that inherently belong to the House, that must of necessity belong to the House, for its very independence rests upon it.

If the House of Representatives can not employ laborers in the absence of law, however necessary it may be for the performance of its work, its independence as a legislative organism is greatly impaired. It is a strange doctrine that the House can not provide itself with necessary facilities to do its work without the consent of the Senate and the executive department of the Government.

I admit by the terms of the rule that no appropriation shall be made for anything except it is previously authorized by law, but that involves only those things that the Constitution contemplates shall be authorized by law, and not those things that inherently belong to this body as an independent branch of the legislature.

Now, is it true that the House has no independent rights that it can exercise, no inherent powers that it can use, in the absence of a law concurred in by the Senate and the Executive? My recollection is that this question was up one time before the Comptroller of the Treasury, or a similar question, a number of years ago. And while he did not directly pass upon the question of the right of the House to make appropriations and use its contingent fund without regard to limitations that had theretofore been imposed upon it by a law regularly enacted, he did take occasion to remark that as a general principle he would be of the opinion that the House did not have the power to limit and restrict itself in such a manner as in any degree to impair its usefulness or its power to perform its constitutional duty; that if it consented to a law to limit its powers, its inherent powers, the powers essential to its independence, it could ignore them in the future. Therefore, I contend that the law that our rules refer to means statutes that apply to governmental activities that are proper to be controlled by the general law, but that it does not apply to those things that belong inherently to the respective departments of the Government, and that are essential in order that they may carry out their constitutional powers and privileges, and I regard this as one of those powers.

The question involved is whether the House may, independently of the Senate, independently of the Executive, employ such assistance in the way of help and labor as it chooses. Of course, under the Constitution appropriations must be made by the Congress, but I say the very independence of the House itself carries with it certain rights and privileges and certain powers without having to go to the Senate or Executive for its consent and concurrence, and I think this is one of them.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In case the law fixes the salary of the Clerk of the House, for instance, at $5,000, does the gentleman hold that this House could, in the face of that law, increase the salary of the Clerk in an appropriation bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If it is necessary, if in the judgment of the House it should ever become necessary for the performance of its functions to change the salary of the Clerk of the House, it has that power. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky is it not a general principle, recognized everywhere, that a legislative body created by the Constitution can not, by legislation or otherwise, tie its hands so that it is unable to do the things that the Constitution requires of it? The House has not the power to shackle itself and disable itself, to disqualify itself, so that it shall not be able to perform the things the Constitution says it shall perform. Whether that inherent power that I am discussing goes so far as to include the salary of the Clerk of the House I am not prepared to say, and it is not necessary to decide that question for the determination of the point of order. This provision is for the employment of labor temporarily for the benefit of the House in its own business.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman must admit that Congress, the two bodies, the House and the Senate constituting the Congress of the United States, has the sole power to fix the salaries of the employees of all offices.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They do not, because the concurrence of the Executive is essential.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that part of it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And if the gentleman will simply follow out his own logic, if we have not the power to do what this appropriation provides, then we are not independent of the Executive, because the essential duties constitutionally imposed upon us may be subject to the approval of the executive department of the Government, a proposition that every constitutional lawyer, of course, would deny.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that, but I might pursue the argument to the point of saying that if the Executive did refuse to approve a bill fixing the salaries of officers at a reasonable sum the Congress could impeach the Executive, and might control the Executive in that way, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is going to extremes in his conclusion.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman is of the opinion, then, that the House has no inherent privilege or powers at all; that its entire existence is——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am not saying that it has no inherent powers, but I am continuing the proposition that the House can override a law enacted by both branches of Congress.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the point of order raised is that under this paragraph of the bill an attempt is made to increase the number of laborers by one. As a matter of fact, the bill does not increase the number of laborers by one, but the number of laborers provided for by the bill remains the same. The paragraph now provides for five laborers. The paragraph as we attempt to embody it in this bill provides for five laborers, and the point raised by the gentleman that we are attempting to increase the number of laborers by one is not well taken. He makes no point as to the increase of the amount of the compensation being paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to its own decision a moment or two ago, in which the Chair stated that the resolution called to its attention by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] would be construed by the Chair as sufficient authority under the law to justify the appropriation. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] I wish to say this: It is true that the House has certain inherent powers, and it has the express power conferred by the Constitution to make rules for its own guidance and action. It has made rules for its own guidance, and it is distinctly provided therein that no appropriation shall be in order upon appropriation bills except under certain contingencies. Now, the only contingency provided for in the rules under which on an appropriation bill new places could be provided or salaries increased would be upon the theory that it was an appropriation for the continuance of a public work in progress; but the Chair is familiar with the fact that all places in the House are either authorized specifically by law or authorized by the House by resolution, and after such resolutions have been adopted then it has been determined that the rule has been sufficiently satisfied to authorize the appropriation for the position on the appropriation bills. The House can provide whatever places it deems necessary, either by resolution payable out of the contingent fund, or by law in accordance with its rules. But I submit to the Chair that the House has no power to create places and to have the salaries or compensation paid for out of the Treasury unless an appropriation is made which is available, and that can be made in only two ways—either by a bill passed and approved by the Executive, or passed by a two-thirds vote of each House over the disapproval of the Executive. So that to a certain extent both Houses of Congress are dependent upon the Executive for the authority to obtain the money to pay the necessary help.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to suggest to the gentleman that there is no statute and never has been one authorizing the appropriation of a contingent or miscellaneous fund for the individual use of the House, and if there were such a statute it would not be binding, because such a fund is absolutely necessary to the very existence of the House. I think the gentleman can see clearly the line of distinction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is a contingent fund provided for by law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the appropriation bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And in this we are going to provide by appropriation bills also, but there is no standing law authorizing the appropriation of a contingent fund of the House or the Senate, but both bodies recognize that fund as absolutely necessary to their existence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true; but it has been invariably held—and I am just going to quote from the ruling of the Chair, made a few moments ago—that the adoption of a resolution was sufficient authority. I call the attention of the Chair to the inconsistent position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER]. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] offered an amendment providing for the employment of three skilled cabinetmakers, the gentleman from

New York [Mr. LITTAUER] made the point of order that these cabinetmakers were not authorized by law, and therefore it was not in order to appropriate for them on this bill, and the Chair sustained that point of order. And it shows that clearly no places of any kind can be provided in this bill, unless they are authorized by law, if some Member interposes the point of order. The House, for its own protection, has adopted rules, and those rules prevent just what is contemplated here.

The CHAIRMAN. Before ruling the Chair would like to be a little more fully advised as to the facts. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to concede that one laborer is authorized by law, but not more than one. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to concede that there is no resolution authorizing a second laborer, but, on the other hand, the gentleman from Texas contends that there is authority for five.

Mr. BURLESON. Under this paragraph there is provision for five. When the gentleman raises the point that we are increasing the number of laborers by one, I say the point does not lie.

Mr. LITTAUER. If that is the point of order, it surely does not. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to state we are increasing the salary of one laborer.

Mr. BURLESON. No; that point was not made.

Mr. HARDWICK. I intended to make that point also.

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you admit you did not?

Mr. HARDWICK. I intended to make the point of order on both.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then I make the point of order that it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Georgia to state what points of order he makes on this paragraph?

Mr. HARDWICK. If you will give me opportunity I will be very happy to do it. First, I will say, under the previous appropriation bill there was only one laborer allowed at $820 per year. I say that under this bill two laborers are provided at $820 a year. I therefore make the point of order that one laborer at $820 a year is not authorized under the rules and should go out as being subject to the point of order. I further insist that if the number of laborers at a smaller salary—to wit, $720—as stated by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Texas, has been decreased in order to add to the other, in that event, if the chairman finds that to be the fact, there would be an increase of salary and that would be subject to the point of order, and I make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair understands it to be the fact that there is authority of law for the appointment of one laborer at $820?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And certain other laborers at a reduced figure, but not two laborers at $820?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the way I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York assents to the proposition. The facts being agreed upon, the Chair has a foundation upon which to rule. The question presented is one not heretofore directly passed upon and one of some importance. It is provided in the Constitution of the United States that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers." The Chair thinks that under that constitutional provision it is not requisite that the consent of the Senate or of the Executive shall be obtained in order to provide, fix, or determine the officers of the House. The House itself is authorized to do that. The Constitution further provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." This House has determined its rules. In the twenty-first rule as now existing there appears this provision:

RULE XXI, SEC. 2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, etc.

In the ruling made a few moments ago the Chair went further, perhaps, than any previous ruling has gone in sustaining the proposition urged by the gentleman from Indiana, and held that a resolution of the House, even of a prior House, creating an office in the House was sufficient authority for the purpose of this rule to authorize an appropriation in the present Congress for the salaries of employees of the House this designated and provided for. But in the absence of any resolution or other authority whatever by the House for the creation of the office or the fixing of a salary, the Chair thinks the House is bound by its own rule in that regard, and that the provision for the second laborer at $820, without previous resolution or authority of any kind, does transcend that rule. The House is empowered under the Constitution to choose its own officers. But it must have chosen them or provided for the office in some way before there can be said to exist the previous authority required by Rule XXI as the basis of an appropriation. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would appeal to the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw the point of order. Particularly in this instance we have one laborer now paid at $820 and four at $720, and we are informed that the work in connection with the House requires that two laborers be used as coal weighers. They are men who do work of a much higher grade than the ordinary common laborer, who gets $720. They must be able to keep accounts and weigh the coal; so that it is hardly fair to have two men doing the same kind of work, one of them to-day paid at $820 and the other at $720. While I realize that the rule will apply, it should not, in all fairness, and I would like the gentleman to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. How can I conscientiously withdraw this point of order and insist upon it in other instances? How are you going to select favorites?

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me you ought not to insist upon it at any time when good reasons can be given why it should not be insisted upon. In this instance there is a clear service rendered the House worthy of compensation. Many salaries here are not in proportion to the service rendered, but this one is. It seems to me that you are invoking a rule in this instance against a laborer who is worthy of his hire.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LITTAUER. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his point of order?

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 24, after the word "grounds," insert "one laborer, $820;" and on page 14, line 2, strike out the word "three" and insert "four."

Mr. LITTAUER. I would state that that amendment simply restores the force as it now stands in the present appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means, $3,000; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,000; messenger, $1,500; janitor, $1,000; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000, and $1,000 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,000; assistant clerk, $1,500; janitor, $1,000; clerks to Committees on Accounts, Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Census, Claims, District of Columbia, Elections Nos. 1, 2, and 3, Foreign Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Indian Affairs, Insular Affairs, Invalid Pensions, Judiciary, Labor, Library, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Pensions, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Printing, Public Buildings and Grounds, Public Lands, Rivers and Harbors, Revision of the Laws, Territories, War Claims, and clerk to continue Digest of Claims under resolution of March 7, 1888, at $2,000 each; assistant clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, $1,600; assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, $1,600; assistant clerk to the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, $1,400; assistant clerk to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, $1,400; assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $1,200; for janitors for rooms of the Committees on Accounts, Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Claims, District of Columbia, Elections Nos. 1, 2, and 3, Foreign Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Indian Affairs, Insular Affairs, Invalid Pensions, Judiciary, Labor, Library, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Pensions, Printing, Public Buildings and Grounds, Public Lands, Rivers and Harbors, Territories, and War Claims, at $720 each, and said janitors shall be appointed by the chairmen, respectively, of said committees, and shall perform under the direction of the Doorkeeper all of the duties heretofore required of messengers detailed to said committees by the Doorkeeper, and shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper at any time after the termination of the Congress during which they were appointed; in all, $102,640.

Mr. LITTAUER. I offer an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer an amendment.

Mr. PRINCE. I make the point of order. I want to make a point of order before amendments are offered. I reserve all points of order on this provision which has just been read, dealing with clerks, messengers, and so forth.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the amendment has been offered and accepted.

Mr. PRINCE. I am just making the point of order. It has not been accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois was on his feet. The Chair did not understand that it was for the purpose of making the point of order.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, Mr. Chairman, will you tell how it is possible for me to make the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that the gentleman from Illinois was on his feet and he did not know——

Mr. PRINCE. I was on my feet, and there were half a dozen others on their feet. I was on my feet for the purpose of making the point of order, and for no other purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand, but supposed it was for the purpose of offering an amendment, and recognized the gentleman from New York to offer an amendment; but if the gentleman from Illinois says it was for the purpose of making the point of order, the Chair will consider it as being made in time.

Mr. PRINCE. I desire to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state his point of order.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir. Beginning on page 15 with the word "and," in line 22, and ending with the word "appointed," in line 1, page 16, the point of order is that it is new legislation on an appropriation bill, under Rule XXI, paragraph 2, as read by the Chairman a few moments ago.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, that is not a change of existing law, but is simply a limitation placed upon the appropriation now existing. It simply states that the janitors for which provision is hereby made "shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper at any time after the termination of the Congress during which they were appointed." I believe I can make an explanation, and that the gentleman will withdraw the point of order. At any rate, I ask unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would not make any explanation.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think I owe it to the gentleman from Illinois to state to him that we found that abuses existed in connection with the janitor force. The janitors are annual appointees, carried on the annual roll, but after the second session of Congress, terminating on March 4, these janitors, appointed by the chairmen of the committees, are subject to no one. They can come whenever they please, or stay away if they please. They have the keys of the rooms. They can not be discharged by anyone. The chairman of the committee who originally appointed them and had charge of their services while a Member of the House no longer is a Member of the House—no longer at least, is chairman. Consequently many little abuses have arisen thereunder. We thought here that after the end of one Congress and before another Congress assembled, before any chairmen of committees were appointed, that these janitors appointed by the chairmen of committees should be subject to the orders of the Doorkeeper of the House, that their keys should only be in their keeping while they ought to be. So that the petty pilfering that was found out to be going on through the janitors, the taking typewriters out of the committee rooms, and other things, should cease; and it seems to me that the point of order should not be raised. This is in the line of proper reform, and I think that whenever a matter of this character is brought to your attention that the point of order should be withdrawn.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, that statement on the face of it looks very plausible; let us read and see what it means. There may be an isolated case of that kind. I do not question that. It would be very strange if, in the selection of some thirty or forty janitors, one might not be found who did not do as he ought to do; but look at the bill and then see if you can claim that it is a limitation:

And shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper.

Is that a limitation? It is an absolute decapitation of a janitor, and the power is given to the Doorkeeper? The appointment is made by the chairman of the committee; and the chairman of any one of the important committees of this House having an annual janitor ought to be held responsible to this House and to the country for his appointee; and if he sees fit to make an appointment that is not a good one, he ought to be held responsible. Now, take, for instance, the committee of which I am chairman. I have a session messenger or janitor. When the time comes for the session to close, that man goes out. The room of the committee then becomes subject to the control of the Doorkeeper; but not so with these annual messengers. Suppose that for some little notion of any kind, or some whim, if you please, some one in spite says, "I want that messenger removed."

Mr. LITTAUER. This does not relate to the messenger service. It only applies to the janitor service.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well, the janitors. The present provision is:

And said janitors shall be appointed by the chairmen, respectively, of said committees, and shall perform, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, all the duties heretofore required of messengers detailed to said committees by the Doorkeeper.

Now, the new provision is that these janitors shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper. I am frank to say that if the chairman of the committee having this in charge will make a provision that will not take the power from the hands of the chairman and relieve him entirely of his responsibility for his appointees I am willing to have any corrective legislation of any kind that is proper, but I am not in favor and I can not consent and will not consent to waive this point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PRINCE. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. What control has the chairman over the janitor after the expiration of a Congress?

Mr. PRINCE. I don't know as he has any control.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; you know he has none.

Mr. PRINCE. I am frank to say that he has none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, these janitors are annual janitors.

Mr. PRINCE. Some are and some are not.

Mr. TAWNEY. This only applies to the annual janitors. They only are affected by the provision. Now, these janitors remain here. They are paid annual salaries, and there is absolutely nobody who has any power to make them do a stroke of labor during the interim between the end of one Congress and the beginning of another.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, our information is that they do not do a thing.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; they refuse to, and for that reason this limitation has been put on this appropriation. This appropriation is for the annual compensation of janitors, and without any power of control whatever over the men who receive that compensation except this provision, which gives to the Doorkeeper of the House not only the power to compel a janitor to work, but the pwer to discharge him and to cease that compensation if necessary.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Does the gentleman think the same limitation ought to apply to clerks of committees?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I do not.

Mr. MANN. But they are in precisely the same position, so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman must bear in mind that the clerks to committees appointed by the chairmen of the committees are appointed from the chairman's own district, and they recognize their responsibility to the man who appoints them; but nine-tenths of these annual janitors are residents of the District of Columbia. They remain here all the time, with absolutely no control over them, and no means of compelling them to perform the service which they are intended to perform.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will agree with me that if somebody should offer an amendment making these clerks removable by the Clerk of the House, it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think we have found an abuse existing here, and we are trying to place a limitation on the appropriation for this service. The limitation means that it would make them subject to removal; the Doorkeeper could not appoint anyone in their place.

Mr. BURLESON. The object is to get the services out of them for which they are paid.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and if they are not rendering the service that they are engaged for, to put some one in their place who will.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Give them the example of the man that had to be followed to Montana and then into Canada to pay him the salary that was due him.

Mr. LITTAUER. We had an instance of one of these janitors who was stealing various articles from the committee rooms. The chairman of the committee, Congress having ended, had no longer any authority over him, and this thief could not be discharged. In fact, it became the duty of the disbursing officer to follow him all over the country from Montana through Canada to pay him a salary.

Mr. MANN. That was not the duty of the disbursing officer.

Mr. PRINCE. But are there no police officers to arrest and courts to punish these thieves for crimes, petty or otherwise? Mr. Chairman, I call for a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This paragraph appropriates the money absolutely, and then follows the provision "and shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper at any time after the termination of the Congress during which they were appointed."

It seems to the Chair that it is not a condition of the appropriation, or a limitation upon it, but a provision of law which is intended to be continuing even beyond the term of the present Congress or after the expiration of the year for which the appropriation is made. It seems to the Chair that it is in violation of the rule, and the Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. Line 15, page 14, assistant clerk, $1,500, to the Committee on Appropriations, an increase of $300. I make a point of order against that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must admit the point of order is well taken, but I again appeal to the gentleman from Georgia on this statement of facts: My own annual clerk receives $1,200 a year, and this provides for $1,500 for the annual clerk of the chairman of the committee. If my clerk is entitled to $1,200, his clerk is entitled to $2,500, for his own personal work at home and all over the country has increased two or three times. His mail is a perfect mass, and comes from all over the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the clerk get his regular salary besides this?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not the same man.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, when this part of the bill went out on the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia, what provision was it?

The CHAIRMAN. Beginning after the word "Doorkeeper," in line 22, page 15, down to and including the word "appointed," in line 1, page 16. The matter before the Chair is on the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist on his point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. I want to say to the gentleman that the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee receives this compensation, and we feel that we are doing in our room as much work as is done in the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 10, strike out the word "messenger" and insert in lieu thereof the words "assistant clerk."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 4, after the word "dollars," insert "assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in lieu of session clerks authorized by resolution, $1,600."

On page 16, lines 1 and 2, strike out "two thousand six hundred and forty," and insert in lieu thereof "four thousand two hundred and forty."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it changes existing law and increases salary.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will reserve the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has an assistant clerk, a session clerk, who acts only during the session of Congress—what we term here a "session clerk." Perhaps the gentleman from Georgia does not know that the fact is that there is no committee of this House, barring only the Committee on Appropriations, that begins to have the volume of work before it that the Committee on Interstate Commerce has. There is no committee in this House, excepting only the Committee on Appropriations, that has the very large number of hearings, that takes the vast amount of testimony, that the Committee on Interstate Commerce does. The committee meets twice a week regularly, and since the 1st of January, since the holiday vacation, there has hardly been a day that the committee has not been in session, and, I think, except two Saturdays, there has been no day when the full committee or a subcommittee has not required the attendance of the clerk or the session clerk; and there have been times when the full committee has been in session in one room and the subcommittee of the committee in session in another room.

Mr. BARTLETT. And all day long.

Mr. SHERMAN. All day long, where it requires the attendance of the clerk at the committee proper and of the assistant clerk at the subcommittee.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman go before the committee and make this showing and make any request about it?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I did not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Neither before the Committee on Accounts nor the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SHERMAN. Neither.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] excepted the Committee on Appropriations from the amount of work done. I make no exceptions. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce considers more public bills than any other committee of the House. They may not do more work than the Committee on Appropriations, because I presume that is impossible, but they have more bills before them of a public character than any other committee in the House. In the last Congress about 25 per cent of the public laws enacted by Congress went through the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. When it has not the full committee in session it has the subcommittee in session taking hearings. These hearings we require the clerk of the committee to give attention to. Now, everybody in the House knows that the ordinary Member of the House uses one clerk attending to his private and official matters. We have in that Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce two clerks, a regular committee clerk and an assistant clerk. That is the one we want in this item. The committee has a larger number of inquiries in reference to the matters of legislation before it than any other committee of the House, and these are all required to be answered by the clerk.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I would desire to suggest to the gentleman that I am inclined to agree with him absolutely; but is there not some way by which this can be done without violating the rules of the House, and having some committee that has jurisdiction over the matter investigate it and report on it?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I may say, as a matter of practice, there is practically no way by which you can do this except in a method violative of the rules of the House, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARDWICK. Could you not get a rule, if it was necessary and so important?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, we would have rules four times a day.

Mr. MANN. I will say it is not important enough to ask for a rule; but here is the situation: The committee clerks are needed, and they ought to have their pay. We received a number of inquiries in reference to the railway rate legislation when that matter was up, and now we are receiving them in reference to the pure-food legislation and in reference to other legislation that is before the committee—an immense number of inquiries. These have to be attended to by the committee clerks. It does not fall to me. I do not appoint the clerks; they are not my clerks. They do not attend to my correspondence, and I know that one committee clerk can not do this work. I hope the gentlemen, in the interest of good government, in the interest of properly presenting these matters to the House, in the interest of properly indexing and going through the hearings, so that we have the convenience of Members considered, will not insist upon his point of order. For instance, this morning, in our committee, we had a hearing concerning lighthouse propositions. They are interesting to a great many Members of the House. The full committee did not finish that hearing, and the subcommittee goes right ahead with its hearings. We will endeavor to consider all of the light-house propositions, and there are a great many. These things are important, and they require attention. We can not do the work of the House unless we have sufficient service for the House, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] I know wants good work out of the committee, and we ask that that committee be given the proper tools with which to do the work, and I appeal to him to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order; but I want to say I will support with pleasure any sort of a proposition to get this done without using this indirect way, violative of the rules of the House. Otherwise I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. This proposition is not to create a new office. There is now an assistant clerk of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and what we desire to do by this amendment is to provide for the continuance of that clerk during the entire fiscal year. We are not attempting to create a new office. The amendment in terms so states. The amendment as presented there simply places a limitation upon the time that the person now in office, now appointed, a sworn officer of the Government, shall serve. That is all there is of it, and I think, Mr. Chairman, along the line of the ruling that the Chair made this morning—somewhat of a pioneer in its line, but a ruling which in my judgment was most essential to make in the line of good order in this House—that it is possible for the distinguished occupant of the chair to overrule this point of order; not only possible, but that it is proper and regular and right that he should do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appreciates the force of the argument made by the gentleman from New York, but nevertheless if the Chair understands the matter the resolution of the House, which is treated as law for this purpose, authorizes a clerk for the session, one whose term expires with each session of Congress, designated in the amendment as a session clerk. The amendment provides for an assistant clerk. Practically it extends the term of the session clerk or creates an office beyond the time authorized by the resolution of the House, and the Chair thinks the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "Doorkeeper," in line 22, page 15, add the following: "Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be expended for the payment of salaries to janitors who refuse to comply with the directions of the Doorkeeper after the termination of the Congress during which they were appointed."

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, it seems to me, meets the desire of the gentleman from New York, who is in charge of the bill. It provides, sir, that this appropriation shall be limited so that no part of it shall be paid to those janitors who willfully refuse to obey the directions of the Doorkeeper, under whose direction the former part of this act places them. You will observe that it provides that after the termination of the Congress for which they were appointed, whenever they refused to obey the directions of the Doorkeeper no part of this sum shall be paid to them. As I said, it is simply a limitation, and it strikes me it reaches the very point that the committee attempted to reach when they prepared this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to raise the point of order on that amendment. I could not hear it, and I have been listening to it very carefully.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late for the point of order after the amendment has been discussed.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, in line 17, after the word "census," insert "in lieu of the session clerk authorized by resolution."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the appropriation for the assistant clerk, $1,500, in line 15, went out on the point of order and takes out the entire appropriation. Is it the intention of the gentleman to offer an amendment reinserting it with the authorized compensation?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think for the time being we will leave it out. I thank the Chair for calling my attention to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

On page 15, line 18, strike out the words "seven hundred and twenty dollars each" and insert "$60 per month each during the sessions of Congress."

The purpose of this amendment and the effect of it——

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I reserve the point. I desire to hear the gentleman's statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. The purpose of the amendment and the effect of the amendment, if it were adopted, would be to pay the janitors $60 a month during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the amendment been reported?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not heard it reported yet, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 17, line 18, after the word "at," strike out "$720 each" and insert in lieu thereof "$60 per month each during the sessions of Congress."

Mr. JOHNSON. If I can get the attention of the committee for a moment, let me say it seems to me there can be no good reason why these janitors should be paid when Congress is not in session. The evidence taken before the Appropriations Committee, on page 26 of the hearings, shows that these janitors do not perform the services for which they are employed even during the sessions of Congress, but that six or a dozen of them get together and hire some darky to keep these rooms in proper shape for a dollar and a half or two dollars each per week. That is the testimony of the Doorkeeper of the House, that these janitors are actually farming out these offices. Gentlemen, it does seem to me that if you are going to give these men $60 a month to attend to the rooms of this Capitol, and they are able to get somebody else to do it for $4 or $5 a month and pocket the difference, while Congress is in session, your generosity ought not to extend to giving them $60 a month from the time Congress adjourns until it meets again. [Applause.] I have nothing to do with the shaping of the legislation of this Congress. I simply call the attention of Members to the fact that these abuses exist, as shown by the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations. If you want to correct these matters, you can do it; if you do not want to correct them, then the responsibility is on you.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will have to renew my point of order. The salary of these janitors, $720 a year, is carried in the current law as the annual compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York whether the existing law fixes it as an annual salary or as a salary at a certain rate per month?

Mr. LITTAUER. The existing appropriation is in the terms, "$720 each"—an annual salary—"in full compensation for the services for the fiscal year," ending as the caption is.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand it to be so stated in the original resolution?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the appropriation law now current.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair desires to know is whether it is fixed as an annual compensation or at so much a month?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is fixed as an annual compensation of $720.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a very close question. The Chair is of the opinion that if the existing resolution providing for the appointment of these janitors fixes the term for the year and provides an annual compensation, the attempt to change it to a monthly service for a monthly compensation for a part of the year is not in the nature of a limitation. It is or would be a very close question. But as the Chair now understands there is no resolution covering this matter at all, no previous authority of law for this appropriation. As the Chair now understands that there is no law fixing the annual compensation, the amendment is in order under the rules.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A question of order. I would like to know what the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina would be.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to know just what the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina will be.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the province of the Chair to state what the effect of an amendment would be; but without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to inquire of the member of the committee having the bill in charge, who has a right to reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, whether or not the statements made in regard to these janitors are true? We ought to know it before voting upon the proposition. I would like to hear the gentleman in charge of the bill state whether these statements are correct or not.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman has been a Member of this House for some years, and no doubt has entered many of the committee rooms. These committee rooms are in charge of these janitors, specifically. There seems to have grown up thereunder certain abuses that have arisen in the service of the janitors which we thought might be corrected, but we felt that it would be too large an undertaking to do it this year. We thought that we might have to come before the House with various propositions that reached properly certain services, and we took the janitor force to see how it could be improved, and therefore the janitor's force is carried on the current appropriation law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. YOUNG. Then, I do understand the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina is substantially correct?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I would not say that. I would not subscribe to that; but we had some testimony that you might consider led in that direction, that it was in a measure correct. We have not made enough investigation into it to warrant us in taking that position.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. Will the gentleman allow me to read from the hearings, on page 26, where Mr. Lyon, the Doorkeeper, was testifying?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; I remember Mr. Lyon's testimony.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is what I wish to read:

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you advise the retention of the 32 annual janitors?
Mr. LYON. No, sir.
Mr. LITTAUER. Does the work of the 32 janitors come under your supervision to-day? Have you any control over them?
Mr. LYON. I have not, absolutely.
Mr. LITTAUER. They are appointed by the chairmen of the committees, to whom they are responsible for their work?
Mr. LYON. Yes, sir.
Mr. LITTAUER. You have no general supervisory care of their work to see that it is properly done?
Mr. LYON. No, sir; none whatever.
The CHAIRMAN. Who has taken care of the 30 committee rooms which have not annual janitors?
Mr. LYON. My messengers.
Mr. LITTAUER. These messengers have the additional duty of taking care of the 30 committee rooms—you designate them for that work?
Mr. LYON. I simply instruct them to do it; to report to the chairmen and ascertain what their pleasure is.
Mr. TAWNEY. How is that work done in practice?
Mr. LYON. It has not been very good.
Mr. TAWNEY. In what respect?
Mr. LYON. They hire other fellows to do the work. Six or eight of them will hire one colored fellow to clean six or eight rooms at $1.50 or $2 a week.

That is the fellow that is doing the actual cleaning.

Mr. LITTAUER. A few of those men do the work properly?
Mr. LYON. Yes, sir.
Mr. LITTAUER. And one of them will take care of six or eight rooms at $1.50 a week?
Mr. LYON. They get $1.50 or $2 a week from each of them.
Mr. TAWNEY. When I was chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, before the Committee on Accounts provided a janitor for that room the only thing the messenger who was designated to do that service did, so far as I recall now, was to come into the committee room every morning and hang up his coat.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is messenger service that the gentleman is referring to now.

Mr. NORRIS. How much a year did he get for that?

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me read a little further:

Mr. LITTAUER. The thirty-two appointments are annual?
Mr. LYON. Yes, sir.
Mr. LITTAUER. What duties do they perform after the adjournment of Congress?
Mr. LYON. They draw their salaries, but perform absolutely no duties whatever. They do not come under my supervision.

That is enough of that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Such was the testimony of Mr. Lyon.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the Doorkeeper of the House, and that is what he says about this force.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that led us at first to a consideration of the question whether we could not withdraw this janitor force from under the chairmen of committees and place it under the Doorkeeper, and thereby with a less force, as suggested by him, perform the work and perform it better than it is now being carried on. But when we met the chairmen of committees who appoint these janitors, they said to us, "Perhaps Mr. Lyon may know of some instances like those referred to, but our janitors suit us, and they do our work in the way we want it done, and we want this janitor force retained." I even bear in mind the chairman of a committee of great prominence here who said to us, "My janitor does work not only in the way of cleaning up his room, but he does clerical service that entitles him to higher pay." So we felt that rather than touch this service this year we would leave it as it is, with the provision in the form in which it is in the bill.

Mr. JAMES. That gentleman referred to by that chairman ought to be a secretary instead of a janitor.

Mr. LITTAUER. Perhaps so, but it happens that the man referred to is hardly accomplished enough—or perhaps he is accomplished enough to call for the salary of a secretary, but we felt we had better not make a new category.

Mr. JOHNSON. What possible service do these janitors render when Congress is not in session?

Mr. LITTAUER. They keep the committee rooms clean and in order for committees whose chairmen or members come back here to do work during the recess.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Lyon says they do nothing but draw their pay.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think that is, perhaps, in large part true, and that these services could be performed with a less force. If the House of Representatives wishes to go over every one of the services connected with the House with a similar idea, we might, perhaps, eliminate a great many of the employees here and lower a great many salaries, but we felt that this janitor service had been maintained here for many years, and that it met with the approval of most of the chairmen of these committees, and we thought we would not attempt to bring about a reform in that line; and it would seem to me that in the future our attempt will be less, because wherever it has seemed to us that we had a good reason either to make a provision or to eliminate it the point of order has been brought against the provision here. It would now seem that the Committee on Appropriations has no right and no duty except to bring before each succeeding Congress a bill exactly in the same words and for the same number of employees and at the same compensation as provided in the current law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to bring to my colleague's attention the testimony on page 37 of the hearing. It is as follows:

Mr. LITTAUER. You have given considerable thought to a reorganization of the janitors' work in connection with the committee rooms and all the janitor work of the House of Representatives?
Mr. LYON. Yes, sir.
Mr. LITTAUER. And you have brought to us the plan that it would be well to diminish this force from thirty-two to twenty-one, and you believe that having twenty-one men under your own supervision you can perform this work to the satisfaction of Congress?
Mr. LYON. I do; outside of two or three important committees.
Mr. LITTAUER. What are they?
Mr. LYON. The Committees on Appropriations, Ways and Means, and Judiciary.

Now, he came to us and we cut them from thirty-two to twenty-one, so that the abuse that has been referred to would stop. You have taken them out of the bill; you have put them back.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is a mistake. We did not do it, but if we had done it I have no doubt the gentleman from Georgia would have started up with a point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. We were attempting to put them under the supervision of the Doorkeeper, but we have since been prevented from doing it.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the gentleman think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina would have saved more money than by cutting the number from thirty-two to twenty-one?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not figured that out; perhaps it would.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has referred to me and the points of order that I have made that seem to have annoyed the committee so much.

Mr. LITTAUER. Not at all; they have not annoyed the committee, but it has destroyed the utility of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the gentleman know that the only points of order I have made were to increases of salary?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are quite as necessary sometimes as reductions.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the gentleman said "elimination, economy, and reduction."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, it is true that during vacation these men do not have much to do, but is it not true of the clerks of committees and stenographers of committees, who receive salaries of $5,000, that they have absolutely nothing to do during the vacation?

Mr. LITTAUER. But their services during the session are such that their continuance is very necessary, and we should give them an annual salary in order to keep them.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is probably true in relation to the janitor.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, to a certain extent, yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The point I am making is that when reformers want to cut down expenses they usually strike at the janitors and laborers—men who get very small pay.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think $1,000 a year small salary?

Mr. LITTAUER. These janitors only get $720.

Mr. HARDWICK. What about the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think he earns $1,000. Anyone who keeps three rooms in such order as everyone who knows anything about it admits that these rooms are kept, certainly earns a thousand dollars. He is here the year 'round. He does three times as much work as these $720 men.

Mr. HARDWICK. What services does he perform during the rest of the year?

Mr. LITTAUER. That room happens to be open the year 'round. There is work in the Appropriations Committee every day in the year and even days which are not secular.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not think the committee ought to adopt so sweeping an amendment. In the first place, there is a good deal of sense in the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that we would be striking at the least abuse which exists. It seems to be the existing method that certain employees of the House should be paid by the year, although the bulk of their services is rendered during the session and does not extend throughout the vacation. There is another objection; these rooms must be provided for in some way. You can not let them lie during the long heat of the summer and go entirely without attention. There might be depredations by rats and mice. I bear in mind that the janitor prevented the destroying of some very valuable documents in one room. They should occasionally be cleaned. Now, I have a word to say for the janitor of my own committee. He was here during nearly all of last summer. His services were essential in the way of copying letters and in filing maps, and those services could not be dispensed with. I was here the most of the time also. It seems to me that the best solution of this whole matter would be the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, but that has gone out on a point of order. I certainly should not object to any regulation under which the Doorkeeper could select the janitors, providing I was sure he would select the most competent men without favoritism, or which would do away with existing abuses; but to pass so sweeping an amendment as this would be, and leave the rooms without care, I think would not be wise. Again, their services are required in certain rooms, not only during the sessions of Congress, but in the vacation as well.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I know very little about this janitor service. I do know, however, that the arrangement we now have is the most miserable that could be suggested. I know that at the commencement of every session of Congress, and during at least a month after the commencement of the session, that every committee which is not provided with a janitor paid annually is obliged to keep its own room clean and in fit condition for occupation, and that whoever is chairman is generally obliged to pay a janitor out of his own pocket. During this session of Congress, until by resolution of this House janitors were provided, one for several rooms, there was no provision whatever for keeping those rooms clean and fit for occupancy. I myself paid a janitor for at least a couple of months of this session. The suggestion of the committee to employ a force of janitors assigned to do janitor work was a good one. The employment of janitors, one for each room at an annual salary, I say, is the worst suggestion that can be made.

Mr. LITTAUER. The condition the gentleman describes in his own committee room does not come because he has an annual janitor, but because his room was taken care of in another way.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I presume that none of the chairmen who are not provided would make complaint if they had annual janitors paid to take care of their rooms, and I am not surprised that those chairmen who have that provision made for them do not stand on the floor of this House and make complaint. I am talking about those who are not thus favored. I am talking about those who have to keep their own rooms clean and fit for occupation during a month or two at the beginning of each session.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then the gentleman's statement does not apply to janitors now under consideration.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I simply say it would be a blessing if the whole thing could be stricken out and, at the proper time and place, some decent provision could be made for janitor service in this Capitol.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I see in counting the number of these committees this provision covers there are twenty-nine. I would like to ask the gentleman whether that includes eleven or twelve janitors that were provided for by the Committee on Accounts by resolution?

Mr. LITTAUER. It does not. The janitors provided by the Committee on Accounts were sessional janitors, and their services were to apply to two or three committee rooms, I believe—each one.

Mr. POLLARD. Just a moment further. Do I understand that these twenty-nine janitors provided for on page 15 are annual janitors?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are.

Mr. POLLARD. For these different committees?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are so stated.

Mr. POLLARD. I see in figuring up these twenty-nine janitors that they receive a little over $2,500 a year each.

Mr. LITTAUER. Seven hundred and twenty dollars a year each.

Mr. POLLARD. Oh, I see; that sum covers the whole paragraph.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; it covers everything.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio argued a moment ago that all of this janitor service should be taken out, and that a proper service should be inaugurated, put under some officer of the House here. The very statement of facts that he made here was not at all in reference to these janitors specifically appointed as annual appointees to the various committees, but to the service of janitors appointed whose duty it was to take care of the rooms not specifically provided for. Now, if that service is not proper in connection with his own room, it seems to me we would have an altogether worse condition of affairs if we should follow the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I am saying simply this: That provision ought to be made for each and every room, or else janitors should be appointed and placed under the direction of some person having in charge these rooms, being responsible for them, so that we can get some kind of decent janitor service. A janitor appointed to any one of these rooms considers his duty done, and possibly it is done, when he has taken care of that room. It seems to me rather a large price to pay for taking care of a single room—$60 a month—when the evidence here is that during certain seasons of the year a few dozen of them club together and get a man to take care of all the rooms for a dollar and a half a week.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NORRIS) there were—ayes 30, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For ten clerks to committees, at $6 each per day during the session, $7,140.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, in line 7, strike out "ten" and insert "eleven;" and in line 8 strike out "one hundred and forty" and insert "eight hundred and fifty-four."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Sergeant-at-Arms: For Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, $5,000; Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; cashier, $3,000; paying teller, $2,500; bookkeeper, $2,200; Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms in charge of pairs, $1,400; assistant bookkeeper, $1,200; messenger, $1,200; one clerk in charge of pairs, $1,400; page, $720; inspector of cabs and other vehicles, $720; and skilled laborer, $840; in all, $22,180.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the $5,000 given the Sergeant-at-Arms on page 16, line 11. I make the point of order that that is an increase over last year's appropriation of $500.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will say, if the gentleman insists, that the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAYNE). The Chair understands the gentleman from New York concedes the point which the gentleman has stated; therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. If the gentleman will withdraw the point of order, I think I can give him good reasons for this increase.

Mr. HARDWICK. I insist upon the point of order. I make the further point of order on page 16, line 14, provision of bookkeeper, at $2,200. Under the law now he is paid $1,800, and I make the point of order that this carries an increase.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the balance of that amount is paid in the deficiency bill, so that the amount here is exactly what he now receives.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is that so? I do not know about that. It does not make it the law now. I still insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LITTAUER. In the deficiency act passed last session there is a paragraph, "For additional salary to bookkeeper in the office of the Sergeant-at-arms, at the rate of $400 per annum, from March 4, 1905, until June 30, 1906, included, $530," making the amount carried in this bill current law.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not affect, however, the appropriation act of June 30, 1906.

Mr. LITTAUER. I thought the Chair had already ruled in line that it did.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair has never ruled so.

Mr. LITTAUER. I thought we were proceeding on the basis that current law had to be followed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed the occupant of the chair appointed for this bill has ruled that where a salary was fixed by a resolution of the House that that applied to the salary after the 1st of July next.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is the law.

The CHAIRMAN. But the paragraph the gentleman from New York read only fixes the salary up to the 30th of June of this year. This is an appropriation for the year after the 30th of June. The Chair is informed that different Chairmen of the committee have recently held that where the law fixes a salary for the current year, that was held to be a limit of the salary, and while the present occupant of the chair might, without any such precedent, rule the other way, the Chair is inclined to follow precedents that have been set and therefore will overrule the point of order. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the salary of the Sergeant-at-Arms having gone out under the ruling, the bill now provides no salary for that official.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let it go.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $4,500; hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; Assistant Doorkeeper, and Department messenger, at $2,000 each; one special employee, John T. Chancey, $1,500; one special employee, $1,500; clerk to Doorkeeper, and janitor, at $1,200 each; thirteen messengers, including the messenger to the reporters' gallery, at $1,200 each; thirteen messengers, at $1,000 each; messenger to the Speakers' table, $1,000; fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; twelve laborers, at $720 each; two laborers in water-closet, at $720 each, ten laborers, at $720 each; one laborer, $600; ten laborers, known as "cloakroom men," two at $60 per month each, and eight at $50 per month each; female attendant in ladies' retiring room, $720; superintendent of folding room, $2,000; five clerks in folding room, one at $1,800, and four at $1,200 each; foreman, $1,500; messenger, $1,200; page, $500; laborer, $720; thirty-two folders, at $800 each; two night watchmen, at $720 each; two drivers, at $600 each; two chief pages, at $900 each; forty-three pages, during the session, including two riding pages, two telephone pages, and ten pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each, $12,792.50; horse and buggy for Department messenger, $250; superintendent of document room, $2,000; assistant superintendent of document room, $1,800; nine assistants in document room, at $1,200 each; and one janitor, $720; in all, $157,062.50.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. To make the point of order. In lines 23 and 24, page 16, there is a provision in this bill that the Doorkeeper shall receive $4,500. Under existing law he only gets $3,500, and I make the point of order that the bill can not carry an increase in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order .

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not make any claim against the gentleman's provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, does that leave the Doorkeeper without any salary at all?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, in line 4, strike out "forty-three" and insert "forty-four;" and in line 5, before the word "and," insert "press gallery page;" and in line 15 strike out "$62.50" and insert "$360."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all commencing with the word "thirteen," on page 17, line 6, down to and including the word "each," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "twenty-six messengers, including messengers to the reporters' gallery, at $1,100 each."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against it that it increases the number of employees.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The effect of this amendment is to place all the messengers of the House doing precisely the same work, one class receiving $1,000 each and another class $1,200 each, upon the same level. The Senate pay their messengers a salary of $1,440. The House have been accustomed to classify theirs in one class at $1,000 and another class at $1,200, thirteen of each. This involves no increase of expenditure. It simply equalizes the expense. It is a fair, square deal all around. The other day the matter was brought up, and gentlemen having this bill in charge admitted it was an equitable proposition, but that at the present time it was not practicable. I hope the point of order will be withdrawn.

Mr. HARDWICK. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think the gentleman is right about it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting $3,500 for the Doorkeeper's salary, in lines 23 and 24.

The CHAIRMAN. What page is that?

Mr. HARDWICK. Page 16. I move to make it the same as is now fixed by law.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that the paragraph has been passed.

Mr. HARDWICK. We are working on that paragraph now, I insist—the whole of that paragraph. Are you opposed to the Doorkeeper having the salary that he ought to have?

Mr. LITTAUER. We have to consider.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 23, after the word "Doorkeeper" insert "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I offer an amendment making that $3,499, and I wish to be heard on the amendment.

In line 23, page 16, after the word "Doorkeeper," insert "$3,499."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is important that it should be known just what is intended to be done. The Committee on Appropriations adopted a provision increasing the salary of the Doorkeeper a thousand dollars. So far as I am personally concerned, I would not raise the point of order against that amendment. Whatever opinion I might have as to the necessity or propriety of increasing the salary of this officer of the House, I was willing to defer to the judgment of those who are most responsible for his service. I am opposed to this House attempting to do by trick what it can not do under the rules of the House; and it should be stated so that the country, at least, will understand what is being attempted. The purpose of defeating the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Georgia to appropriate the amount now fixed by law for the salary of this official is to wait and beg the Senate to place in the law compensation for one of the officials of this House. The Doorkeeper has a salary fixed by law, and it appears to be the intention of this House not to provide in the proper place for his compensation, but to go elsewhere and get it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The salary of the Doorkeeper is not fixed by law, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chairman has ruled that the salary is fixed by law, and therefore it can not be raised.

Mr. TAWNEY. The salary of the Doorkeeper is fixed by the current appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, that is the law.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no present law fixing the salary of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the salary of the Doorkeeper is fixed by law. By a thousand rulings it has been so held, and it is fixed at $3,500.

I am not opposed to appropriating $4,500, but I am opposed to putting the House in the ridiculous and contemptible position of going and begging the Senate to give the money to pay employees of the House. The gentleman from Georgia offered an amendment appropriating $3,500. It was in order. Nobody disputed it. The gentlemen on that side gave no reason for not appropriating that sum. But the intention is to let this bill go to the Senate and have the Senate do what this House should do. Now, if the amendment I have offered is adopted, the effect will be to reduce the salary of the Doorkeeper $1 a year. That is a more decent thing to do than to go and beg another body.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is not in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is. Why is it not in order? Does it change any existing law? No; it does not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, it does change existing law, if the present law fixes the salary at $3,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota knows that, under the law fixing salaries, the House has the power under its rules to appropriate a less sum, but it has not the power to appropriate a greater sum. The gentleman from Minnesota knows that full well; but he is a party to this scheme of making this House contemptible, of lowering its dignity, of going and beseeching another body to put in here compensation for the Doorkeeper. I submit that a decent respect for ourselves would compel us to make this appropriation.

If this amendment be not adopted, then I will move to strike from the bill the position of Doorkeeper of the House, because I for one am not willing to provide positions here and not provide the money for the positions. Gentlemen on that side, who are in control, who have the votes giving them the power to do the proper and decent thing, can take the responsibility, if they wish to refuse to appropriate the money; if they wish to provide a place and then go beseeching the Senate to make the necessary appropriation. Perhaps that will help to maintain the dignity of the House and its prerogatives and a decent respect for us on the other side of this Capitol and throughout the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] intimates that the gentleman on this side of the aisle may, if they choose, assume a certain responsibility. I can assure you that the gentlemen on this side of the aisle have never in any way attempted to shift responsibility when they have been in the majority. They are entirely willing, on this and on all other propositions, to carry the full share of the responsibility that rests upon the majority party in this House, on this proposition or upon any other proposition.

The gentleman intimates, Mr. Chairman, that the House is attempting to do something by a trick. The gentleman is in error. He intimates that the committee is attempting to override the wishes of a majority, as here evident, by a vote. The gentleman again is in error. So far as any vote which has here been taken is concerned, there is nothing to indicate that this committee does not desire by a majority of all to one that the salary of the Doorkeeper shall be fixed at forty-five hundred dollars. What the House is attempting to do in Committee of the Whole, and attempting, I believe, in a proper procedure, is to nullify the dictate of one man and to follow the known desires of the many. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York, my honored colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD], has any desire to reduce the salary of this particular official below forty-five hundred dollars. There is no dissenting voice in the report of the Committee on Appropriations on this bill. It is a unanimous report, coming from the committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished member, and than whom no one on this committee is more industrious, as his efforts and his work on this floor have over and over again indicated.

We are attempting here, sir, by this procedure, to have incorporated in this bill the will of a very large majority, and, I say, as far as the record shows, the will of all the House, save one man; and as far as the merits of the proposition are concerned, Mr. Chairman, I think no man in this House who has been here any length of time, who has observed in the least the doings of its various officials, will fail to recognize the fact that the Doorkeeper of this House has hundreds of subordinates under him for whose proper attention to their duties he alone is responsible. He must be here not merely during the sessions of Congress, but he must be here a very large portion of the time during the recess, because these various employees under him, in the folding room and in other departments, must be here the entire year, attending to the wants and necessities of the Members, and he must be here more than any other officer of the House. Under his control, under his supervision, under his guidance, under his orders, are scores more of the employees of this House than under any other official, and I believe this House knows that the compensation that the Appropriations Committee inserted in this bill for that official—inserted not merely as an act of caprice, but inserted after giving full hearing to everybody, and inserted, as I understand, by a unanimous vote, with nobody dissenting—is the salary which the House desires him to receive. If the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Georgia would permit this committee to vote directly on the question, I am sure the Committee on Appropriations—or those who were in the minority, if in the minority they prove to be—would not dissent from that result; but what the Committee on Appropriations and what we all who are interested in having those things done which tend to the comfort of Members object to is that one man shall set up his opinion, and by invoking a rule prevent us from taking such action as we believe will add to the comfort of the Members and the orderly procedure of affairs in the House; and I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this committee will see fit to vote down the amendment offered by my honored colleague, having in view the ultimate result of putting this salary at the figure which the Appropriations Committee after careful investigation have determined to be the fair compensation for the labor he renders.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, this House this afternoon, acting in Committee of the Whole, presents to the country a remarkable spectacle. When Members of the House, under the rules of the House, in an orderly and proper manner, seek to invoke the rules of the House, they are criticised, and because the rules adopted by the House, and under which the Members are living, seem to impinge a little harshly upon the members of great committees, they then say, "We will do nothing; we will go to another body; a body that we are standing here solidly against"——

Mr. LITTAUER. On whose assertion does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. PRINCE. I do not know how you are going to get the salaries placed there unless you go elsewhere.

Mr. LITTAUER. Perhaps the gentleman might ask and get the information.

Mr. PRINCE. Then if the gentleman will tell me, how will he get it replaced?

Mr. LITTAUER. We might expect to get it replaced by a resolution from the Committee on Accounts, or we might ask for a rule which would permit us to have a vote on this proposition. I can not understand how either the gentleman who is now addressing the House or the gentleman from New York can state that this is a trick, as it was called, or that this is our actual intention.

Mr. PRINCE. In answer to the gentleman, permit me to say that I do not know what is in the mind of the gentleman who has just addressed the committee, but I am giving utterance to what the gentleman said who preceded me and preceded him—the gentleman from New York. Now, the gentleman says that he can, under the rules of the House, get these salaries restored. Why do you not, as a law-abiding Member of this House, under the rules proceed according to the rules and have your measures brought in here not in violation of those rules?

Mr. LITTAUER. Because under the rules of the House we are allowed to proceed otherwise.

Mr. PRINCE. Why does not the gentleman bring in these measures so that they will not be subject to a point of order? Why does he not go to the Committee on Accounts to bring it in?

Mr. LITTAUER. Because in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of one thousand the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations is agreed to by the House and adopted without making a point of order.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well; I will concede that, although it is a lame answer. The gentleman says he can go to the Committee on Rules and get a rule that will bring it in here.

Mr. LITTAUER. I did not say I could get one; I said I could try.

Mr. PRINCE. Then why does not the gentleman apply to the committee?

Mr. LITTAUER. Because I have not had the opportunity.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to answer me and the country if you made no application under the rules of this House to get a resolution from the Committee on Accounts, if you made no application to the Rules Committee by which you can obtain a rule, are you not proceeding against the known rules of this House when you ask us to act in this way?

Mr. LITTAUER. We are on page 16 of this bill, which has 176 pages——

Mr. PRINCE. Can it be otherwise when the rules of this House say that certain propositions when offered or when attached to an appropriation bill are against the rules of the House? The rules have been invoked, an orderly proposition has been presented, and two different occupants of this chair this afternoon have decided; one, the distinguished floor leader of the House on the side of the House to which I belong, promptly held that the proposition was out of order. Where is there anything wrong? I have felt the force of this rule; I have obeyed it. Why should not the gentleman take the same medicine that you have been dealing out to us on other committees, not only in homeopathic doses, but in allopathic doses, and you are receiving it yourselves this afternoon.

Mr. LITTAUER. To what rule is the gentleman referring which would require us to submit a salary when it has once been stricken out by the House?

Mr. PRINCE. Oh, Mr. Chairman, just see the position we are in. Here is the House of Representatives standing to-day upon its dignity. To-morrow they will meet in this House. If we are permitted, we will by an overwhelming vote say that the dignity of the House of Representatives must be maintained against the vote of another concurrent body upon the statehood proposition. And yet here we are refusing to appropriate a cent for the salary of the Sergeant-at-Arms, refusing to appropriate a cent for the salary of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, confessedly unable to restore these salaries except in two ways, neither of which has the gentleman seen fit to invoke. The third is to go to the body that we are standing up against, go to the body in the strength and dignity of our character and ask them to grant this legislation. Now, what about this childish way? Why not restore this salary according to law? The committee of this great body is in the position of saying, "If you don't play as we want you to, you can't slide down our cellar door." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To debate the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Am I not entitled to five minutes to close the debate, more than one gentleman having discussed it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he can move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the last word, if necessary. In the first place, I am not responsible for the rule which makes it possible for a single Member to interpose an objection that prevents the consideration of the increase of salary suggested by the Committee on Appropriations.

The gentleman's side of the House, the Republican side, is responsible for that rule, and it is not too much to expect the gentlemen who adopted the rules to be willing to live up to them. We have to do it. We have no choice. The least the gentlemen on that side could do would be to acquiesce in the rules they adopted themselves. I stated that I would not interpose the point of order to the provision increasing the salary of the Doorkeeper. So far as I was concerned, I was willing to permit the House to pass upon this question. If the question is presented to the House, I will vote against the increase, not because I think that in that way I would prevent it, but simply to give expression to my views on this question. Let me call the attention of the House to the effect of omitting to provide an appropriation at this point. This bill will then read:

For Doorkeeper, hire of horses, feed, repair of wagons and harness, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], in charge of the bill, says that it is an unwarranted assertion to state that the House intends to obtain this appropriation through some other source. Perhaps as the gentleman is in charge of the bill, knowing what is going to take place, he will now make a statement that he or somebody in his behalf intends to apply to the Committee on Rules for a rule to put the eliminated portion back. Regardless of what the salary of this employee should be, I am opposed, so far as I am concerned, to so far lowering the dignity of this House as to go to some other body and ask that body to appropriate for our employees. I would prefer that the employee get $3,500 than that the House should lower itself and beg the Senate to fix the compensation of this employee, because if we do not put in some compensation the Senate is at liberty to fix that compensation itself. For that reason I hope that the amendment appropriating $3,499, one dollar less than the amount now fixed by law, which is the only amendment now in order, unless we put in a much smaller amount, will be adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 25, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, line 16, strike out the word "sixty" and insert the word "seventy."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, that is in harmony with the action of the House from March 8, 1906, raising the salary of these two cloakroom servants from $720 to $840 and authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to insert it in this bill. I refer to the RECORD of March 9, 1906, page 1906.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LIVINGSTON) there were—ayes 32, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerk to the conference minority of the House of Representatives, $2,000; and for assistant clerk, $1,500; in all, $3,500.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, or, rather, reserve it, so that I can get some information why there has been an increase in the salary of the clerk to the conference minority.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, there has been an increase in the salary of the assistant clerk to the conference minority of the House of Representatives from $1,200 to $1,500, because it was requested by the Representatives of the minority, who advised us that the services performed by that individual assistant clerk were well worth $1,500, and in conformity with that request we submit it to the House.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the point of order is made to the words "one thousand five hundred dollars."

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then does the whole salary go out?

The CHAIRMAN. Just the amount. The Chair understands just the words "one thousand five hundred dollars" go out. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, we want to offer an amendment to insert in lieu thereof the words "one thousand two hundred dollars," which was the salary heretofore paid.

Mr. PRINCE. To that I have no objection.

Mr. LITTAUER. I trust, Mr. Chairman, the House will not agree to that, but that this may stand on all fours with the other, so that they may stand together.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 19, strike out the words "one thousand five hundred dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one thousand two hundred dollars."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be no objection to that amendment and that the House will not blindly follow the advice of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], that because a point of order is made, and properly made, there should be no provision made for this employee at all. I understand, perhaps, that it is to be put in somewhere else. I agree with my friend from New York that it is a curious spectacle to see the great Committee on Appropriations losing their temper because they can not carry every point which they put in their bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope if there is a single Member of the House on either side who objects to this increase that the amendment will not only be adopted, but the bill will not come back from the Senate with the amendment in it. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia will be adopted, and I express the hope when the bill becomes a law it will become a law with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia in it, which merely puts the matter back to where it was before.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the committee will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, but it will leave the salary for this assistant clerk stand in the same way that salaries of other officials connected with the House now stand, without any particular appropriation. These matters have gone out on points of order, and gentlemen on the other side seem inclined to insinuate that it is our intention and that we have no other intention except to have them reinserted in the Senate. I do not know on what basis they make the statement, but I believe we can reinsert these salaries and reinsert them by a vote of the committee before the committee shall finally rise and report this bill or vote upon the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HAY) there were—ayes 40, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stenographic and typewriting services, to be expended by the chairman of the conference minority, $600.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this provision was carried last year in the deficiency bill.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I want to hear from the gentleman. I do not find it in the copy of the bill as I have it.

Mr. LITTAUER. No; but you will find it in the deficiency bill, and the paragraph is, "For stenographic and typewriting services, to be expended by the chairman of the conference minority and to continue available during the fiscal year 1906, $600."

Mr. PRINCE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I still insist upon my point of order. As I understand Rule XXI, this is subject to the point of order. There is no resolution of the House authorizing this appropriation. A deficiency bill is nothing more nor less than current law, just the same as any other appropriation bill, and if the deficiency bill on the last session contained that amount and it was improperly there and was subject at that time to the point of order, as has been repeatedly held not only by this occupant, but by other occupants of the chair an innumerable number of times, that the current law having an appropriation which is not justified by law does not make it a provision of law, nor does it any the less cause it to be subject to the rules of this House.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this provision carried in the deficiency bill is the appropriation for the current year, just as much so as though carried in the legislative bill. We submit an appropriation for a continuation of a work now in progress and authorized by law.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, just another word. If the position of the gentleman from New York be true, then see where it leads to. We appropriate in this committee for the salaries of different officers. The gentlemen then bring in a deficiency bill and they add from one hundred to five hundred or a thousand dollars to the salary of the officers as we have fixed them here in an appropriation bill. That goes into the deficiency bill. No one happens to see or know anything about that. It passes. Then next year they come up and say the current legislative and executive appropriation bill carries so much—say, $1,200—and the deficiency bill, which we knew nothing about, carried $300, and therefore the $1,200 the House had knowledge of and the $300 the House did not have knowledge of is added to the other and you then have a salary of $1,500. In that way, perhaps, I can see how the general Appropriations Committee can raise all of these salaries—let this bill go through the House as it is and then on the deficiency give an increase.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. As I understand, the gentleman from Illinois is now engaged in a strenuous effort to preserve and compel obedience to the rules of this House. I now desire to ask if, in making a second speech upon this question, he is violating any rule of the House?

Mr. PRINCE. I am inclined to think, in fairness to the gentleman, if anybody had raised the point of order, I should have subsided. As the gentleman is extremely familiar with the rules of the House, I am deeply surprised he did not insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to be arguing his point of order; and this is in order if he desires to be heard upon it.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, then, as it appears I was in order [laughter], on page 354, under the head of "Appropriation bills," it says: "The reenactment from year to year of a law intended to apply during the year of its enactment only does not relieve the provision from the point of order." I understand that to be the rule of the House and the interpretation thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give the Chair again the reference to that authority and the page?

Mr. PRINCE. Page 354, the third or fourth provision down. "The reenactment from year to year." Does the Chair catch it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from New York if there is any resolution or other authority of law existing except the fact that heretofore appropriation has been made for the item against which the point of order is raised?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no resolution. There was a request by the representatives of the minority to put it into the deficiency bill last year. The deficiency bill last year was approved by this House. It is current law to-day, standing the same, as I believe, in the same line as all the other matters that have been passed on. It is a work in progress, current law, and authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule invoked in this instance is Rule XXI, the second section of which provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Now, without going into the matter more in detail, it has been held—was held in the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress—as reported in page 354 of the Manual:

The reenactment from year to year of a law intended to apply during the year of its enactment only, does not relieve the provision from the point of order.

It had been previously ruled, in the Fifty-fifth Congress, in the Fifty-seventh, and again in second session of the Fifty-eighth, as cited on page 353 of the Manual, that—

An appropriation for an object in an annual appropriation bill, makes law only for that year, and does not become "existing law" to justify a continuance of the appropriation.

Rule XXI makes an exception in this language:

Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

And that phrase also has been defined, as will appear, upon page 345 of the Manual, wherein it is held:

By public works and objects already in progress, are meant tangible matters, like buildings, roads, etc., and not duties in an Executive Department.

It seems to the Chair that there is no provision, resolution, or authority of law for this appropriation; and that it is not in continuation of a Government work in progress, and the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. As I understand, the Chair sustains the point of order?

Mr. PRINCE. He does.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, superannuated clerks and how to get rid of them, and extravagance and waste in the public service and how to stop it, have been the theme debated on the floor of the House and discussed in the press of the country during the last week. Longevity should not be looked upon as a disgrace. It indicates a good native constitution and temperate life. "Whom the gods love die young" is a poetical fallacy, invented to console the hopeless invalid, the unfortunate, and the bereaved. Whom the gods love do not die young, for they create them with discriminating palates, painless stomachs, good digestion, strong hearts, large lungs, quiet nerves, and red blood, and all the organs so healthy, sound, and well adjusted as to warrant a long and vigorous existence for the battle of life and struggle for success.

The person with a sound mind in a sound body wants to live. It is doubtful if there is any such phenomenon as rational suicide. Then, too, if we live we must grow old, look old, and we are very lucky if we don't feel old. The true philosophy of life is to grow old gracefully and to continue young old men and women, after the example of Benjamin Franklin, William E. Gladstone, George F. Hoar, and the late Susan B. Anthony, of blessed memory.

My mother will be 87 years of age the 6th day of next May, and she is still a young woman. I am proud of her, and prouder for every year that passes over her head and leaves her with fair health and sound faculties. Her life has not been a bed of roses, and her years indicate an excellent constitution to start with, and a clean, temperate, moral life. I respect age and gray hairs, and sincerely sympathize with the old employees in the Executive Departments of Washington. The agitation and discussion which this debate has created must be very embarrassing and humiliating to them. The finger of ridicule, if not of scorn, is being pointed at them, and they are told they must be Oslerized in order to save Secretary Root and the Appropriations Committee from a perplexing problem.

Deal gently with these old people, not alone for humanity's sake, but on the score of economy. Suicide is a crime, forbidden by the decrees of God and man. They can not be expected to violate the law of the land as well as the law of nature in order to relieve this embarrassing situation. They must live and must be supported somehow—in the almshouse if nowhere else. If cripples, imbeciles, inebriates, the aged, and all kinds of incompetents could be banished from our shores and the burden of their support shifted, there would be considerable force in the argument for their expulsion from the service. But since they must be supported by the country, or by some municipal division thereof, it is economy to let them do such work as they are able and earn their daily bread. Do not crucify them to avenge your spite against the civil-service system. They are not the cause, and it can hardly be said they are the consequence of it. That system was inaugurated twenty-two or twenty-three years ago. Therefore all, or practically all, who are now 70 or upward were appointed under the old plan of Congressional patronage and the spoils system. But the blanket of the civil service was gently placed over them, and they were made comfortable. They have grown old in the service, with the assurance of steady jobs and fair pay, and have been consoled with the hope of pensions on which to round out and terminate their careers.

This is a condition which confronts us, and let us not be too cruel in our spasm of virtuous economy. Do not chop their legs off short when they are 70. That would be too shocking. Do not abruptly terminate their relations with the Government and turn them out in the cold, cruel world as a burden on their relatives. This is rapidly becoming a paternal Government, and in taking care of these old people paternalism and humanity go hand in hand. Their work has become to them a profession, and they are fit for nothing else. They are too old to seek their livelihoods in other places or in other lines. They have not the courage, for they are aware they will never be able to find a new master as kind and indulgent as their Uncle Samuel.

After listening to all the plans proposed for relief I am persuaded to concur substantially with the one suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. It is doubtless true that the average man at 80, 70, or, perhaps, 65 is not as well able to do continuous and laborious physical and mental work as he was at 30. This fact is recognized by the Government.

The Commissioner of Pensions or the President, or both, made an Executive order some time ago that veterans of the civil war at the age of 62 were disabled by half for manual labor. That degree of disability is presumed, and no evidence is required to prove it; and that such disability continues to increase until the age of 70, when he is totally disabled. And the voters of the country seemed to agree with the Executive and to approve his action, as demonstrated in the election of 1904. The soldiers were picked men, and even after their military service in youth were as strong and enduring as the average men in their several communities. The mind fails more or less with the impairment of the body, and the work of these employees is manual as well as mental. And while their accumulated experience offsets in some degree their accumulated ailments, the chances are that at 70 they are not all as well able to work as in early life.

As to the remedy, I am inclined to concur substantially with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. Give the Civil Service Commission and the force in that office something to do besides examining papers and reporting general averages and the eligible lists. Let them examine the employees as they grow old, idle, or otherwise incompetent to do good average work. Let their salaries be reduced from time to time and made commensurate with their earning power. That will not mean starvation exactly. If they have made no provision for the future, they will have to curtail their living expenses to fit their incomes. That will be pretty hard, for it is an easy matter to increase one's expenses, but very difficult to reduce them. Habits of ease and comfort grow on one until luxuries become necessities. This gradual tapering off of old men's salaries, which may seem to them like gradual starvation, will have to be endured if by economy and thrift they have made no provision for their age. Retribution is one of nature's great laws. Then, it will serve as an object lesson to the young men in the service to save a little while the sun shines for a rainy day.

The other proposition is to remedy the present evil by rotation in office. That was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and apparently approved by several other Members of the House. My notion is that this would be bad for the public service and worse for the body politic. Experience in any work, however simple, increases the efficiency.

Much of the work in the Executive Departments is technical and difficult, and the mastery of it becomes a profession. Great railroad corporations and business houses recognize this fact, and retain their clerks and employees during good behavior, and permit them to gradually rise in the service. In those concerns the heads of the businesses are apt to continue permanently. Much more important is it that the people who do the actual work continue in the service of the Government, because the heads of Departments and high executive officers, who are not in the classified service, come and go with each change of Administration. With rotation in office every five or six years, and a hard and fast rule for its enforcement, every employee would know when his time would come to leave. He would be constantly on the lookout for other employment, and would leave on a moment's notice when such an opportunity occurred. Further, there would not be much incentive to improve, for as soon as he became proficient in his line of work he would have to abandon it to his successor. This would lead to confusion, to waste of time and energy in educating people only to be dismissed as soon as they became proficient and valuable. It would in my judgment, lead to more extravagance and loss than the present system, even with the superannuated help.

But the effect of this system on the young men and women who would rotate in and out of Washington would be very injurious and unfortunate. The most promising young men would not desire that kind of employment. Six years between 20 and 30 are an important part of a young man's capital and stock in trade. Those are years of activity, energy, ambition, and willingness to work and make a start in life. The foundation of a business career should be laid during that period. If a young man have a profession in view, those years should be spent in patient toil and study, and if in adversity, because of lack of clients or patients, so much the better. He is then full of hope and aspirations and can enjoy the pleasures of anticipation. Those years should not be frittered away in a line of work which he does not intend to make his life vocation.

But what would be the influence of this system on the young man who would accept this kind of temporary employment? I will admit that plenty of help could be secured, but not the best. The attractions of this beautiful city would charm some. Comparatively large salaries, short hours, and light work would secure others. They would flock in from the farms, schools, and stores, with high aspirations and good intentions to save their money, with which to start in some business or profession; but a certain place is said to be paved with good intentions. They would find living in this city expensive, distances long, walking laborious, street cars convenient, theaters open, restaurants inviting, and the fair sex abundant and willing to be entertained. They would be deprived of the wholesome influences of their homes and mothers, and poor human nature is weak and prone to pleasure. Their monthly stipends would melt away like a June frost, and their good resolutions with them. They would surrender themselves to the social conditions of their new environment. They would buy dress suits on the installment plan, read Town Topics, float on the fringe of society, and learn to converse in the elaborate nothings. They would not dare express any views on public questions, and from perpetual restraint would soon cease to think. The tendency would be to make them timeservers, and they would fast lose that freedom and independence and mental virility which is the inheritance of every American and should continue his abiding possession.

Then, too, they would find it embarrassing to obey the President's injunction against race suicide. For without means, without prospects, and without steady employment and an assured income they would hardly dare assume the responsibility of families; and mothers of marriageable daughters, especially in Washington, would not look with favor on their suits. At the end of six years they would have to leave, without capital, without business, without trade or profession, and with expensive tastes and extravagant habits, and perhaps inoculated with the "lazy bug," for which Doctor Ashford thinks he has recently discovered a specific. They would have to go out into a cold, cruel world empty-handed, heavy hearted, and a new relay would drift in to take their places and go through the same demoralizing rotation and routine.

The theory of rotation in office may be, and I think it is, popular with the masses of the people throughout the country. It is quite natural that men who work at the primaries and polls and bear the burden of practical politics should feel a little envious of their neighbors, who, by reason of more book learning, get into the classified service of the Government, where they have permanent employment, sure pay, and short hours. The idea of putting them out and taking their places seems attractive. They think that good things should be passed around so that each may get a taste. But such a process would prove an illusion and a serious damage in the long run. It would be a loss to those going out and a curse to those going in.

The Government clerks at Washington are not to be envied. An annual salary of $1,000 looks big to a young man out on a farm or in a village. He thinks that on such an income he can be a person of considerable consequence. He comes to this city, the center of political and social affairs and the home of millionaires, who spend money like water in luxury and style. His income is very small in comparison, and seems to him smaller year by year. Worse yet, he continues to shrink in his own estimation. He becomes discontented and dissatisfied with himself, because he can not help comparing his condition with that of those more fortunately situated. He thinks he is wasting his life and missing opportunities, but has not the courage to cut loose and try his luck at something else. Thus he grinds out his existence, doing one thing and doing it well. But he has no chance for initiative and little chance for development, and practically becomes an automatic cog in the great machine. Many bright and promising intellects have been thus stunted and dwarfed. They make sacrifices in the public service and are entitled to some consideration.

Some men begin to break down at 65, and at 70 they are worn out. I do not suggest that they should be retained and salaried, for that would in effect put them on a civil pension list. But why should a man who has led a temperate life and is strong and vigorous at 65, and able to do a high-class work, be reduced in rank and pay? Why should he at 70, while still able to render faithful and efficient service, be turned adrift by an unrelenting and automatic law? Each man should be treated according to his merits and each employee should be given a square deal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Official reporters: For six Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, at $5,000 each; assistant official reporter, $1,500; in all, $31,500.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order against the provision, in line 1, page 21, $1,500 for the payment of the assistant official reporter. Under existing law he gets $1,200, and I am obliged to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order that under the existing law the assistant official reporter gets $1,200, and the proposition now is to make it $1,500 in this bill; therefore I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no answer to make against the point of order, but I want to call the attention of the House, however——

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve it just a moment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Here is an official of the House, the assistant official reporter, who now receives a compensation of $1,200. He sits at this moment at the desk in front of you. His work is to gather together the manuscript of our speeches here, as written out by the Official Reporters, to see that the Members who wish to revise their speeches have an opportunity to do so, and to see that the entire manuscript report is properly put together at the end of the day. He has other duties in connection with the same work, and his services require not only constant vigilance, but a decidedly higher degree of intelligence than is required in many other forms of service about this House, for which salaries as large as $1,500 are paid. We believed it was simple justice to him to raise his salary to $1,500.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. He is a stenographer, is he not?

Mr. LITTAUER. His work here is not stenographic. It is what I have stated.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. But he is a stenographer?

Mr. LITTAUER. He is.

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to supplement what the gentleman from New York has said by saying that every one of the corps of Official Reporters joined in an earnest request to the subcommittee that this increase be given, thinking that this man's compensation was less than he actually earns.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement which has been made on this particular matter, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia withdraws the point of order.

Before proceeding further, the Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New York a further question with reference to a previous item which went out on a point of order. The Chair understood that the only authority for it was found in the current appropriation bill. The Chair would now like to ask whether that authority consists of anything further than the mere appropriation? It might well be that in an appropriation bill there was legislation. Of course, if such legislation has been concurred in by the other legislative body and approved by the Executive, it is just as much law, although contained in an appropriation bill, as if contained in any other bill; but a mere appropriation for the current year would not make it have the force of continuing legislation so as to support an appropriation for a different year. A permanent provision in an appropriation bill—creating a permanent and continuing office—would, however, stand upon a different basis.

Mr. LITTAUER. That was the point which I wished to call to the attention of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman read the paragraph again?

Mr. LITTAUER (reading):

For stenographic and typewriting services, to be expended by the chairman of the conference minority, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1906, $600.

The CHAIRMAN. That is merely an appropriation for the current year, and under the ruling cited does not create a permanent office nor authorize an appropriation for any period beyond the current year.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is on all fours with all other appropriations for the current year, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been, in some instances, items of permanent legislation in an appropriation bill, but this is not one of them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. On page 16, where I attempted to amend by striking out the word "sixty" and inserting the word "seventy," Members who voted against the proposition stated to me that they did not understand it, did not know it was the action of the House. I ask to go back to that.

The CHAIRMAN. It could be done by unanimous consent only.

Mr. LITTAUER. I must object at this time to returning to that paragraph. We may take it up later.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I shall ask to take it up later—when we get to the end of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That wherever the words "during the session" occur in the foregoing paragraphs they shall be construed to mean the one hundred and nineteen days from December 3, 1906, to March 31, 1907, both inclusive.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, line 7, after the word "at," strike out "five" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. LITTAUER. That amendment comes too late, Mr. Chairman. The paragraph has been passed, and the next paragraph has been completed.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet and addressing the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The Chair directed the Clerk to cease reading, but the Clerk did not hear the Chairman. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio to offer his amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I reserve the point of order against the amendment and request that it be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment may be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not understand the amendment. The existing law fixes the compensation at $5,000. Is the proposition of the gentleman to make it $25,000?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment in another form.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, line 7, strike out the words "five thousand" and insert the words "two thousand five hundred."

Mr. LITTAUER. To that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is within the prerogative of the House to appropriate a less sum than the salary fixed by law, and overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to discuss this question at length, but this committee has assiduously examined into the salaries which have been paid to the different employees of the House. We have been raising the salaries of clerks and janitors and cutting down salaries, and it seemed to me that it would be well to call attention to the salaries which we are now paying to the committee stenographers of the House. I was prompted to call attention to this matter by a little incident which happened the other day in the committee.

A gentleman who had appeared as a witness before the committee wrote me saying that he had received a bill for a small amount, and I took it to be a bill from one of the committee stenographers for certain notes which had been furnished him by the stenographer. That was perfectly legitimate, Mr. Chairman. There was nothing out of the way with it at all, but it was merely a suggestion that there was a way open by which the committee stenographers might increase their compensation beyond that which is provided in the legislative appropriation bill of the House.

It was a transcript of the gentleman's own testimony. He had a perfect right to ask the stenographer for a transcript of the notes, but he wrote in asking if there was not some way by which the committee could provide for the payment of this bill to the stenographer. Now, it seems to me that the amount paid the stenographers, who only give a part of the time during five months of the year on the average, and who receive a compensation of $5,000, ought to be sufficient without extra compensation. It seems to me that this committee might well direct its attention to determine whether or not $5,000 is not more than a fair compensation for work which these men perform. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee or the distinguished gentleman from New York, who has charge of this bill, who appoints the stenographers to committees?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Who fixes the compensation?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is fixed by law.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I have no desire to further oppose this appropriation, but I would like to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. TAWNEY. I wish to be recognized in my own right when the gentleman is through.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I have said all I wish to now.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am convinced from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio that the committee has made a great deal more investigation into these services than the gentleman has. Had he investigated it he would have found that these committee stenographers have to pay for the translations that are made. They employ their own typewriters, and when there is a transcript desired, as was desired by the friend of the gentleman from Ohio, that goes to the typewriter or the person that is employed by the stenographer for payment of the services which that typewriter renders in the making of the transcript.

Now, one word further. The committee stenographers work from the time the committees meet in the morning until 5 and 6 o'clock at night.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, yes; and frequently until midnight.

Mr. TAWNEY. I mean with the committees. They must then dictate their notes to a phonograph, or to another stenographer, or write them out themselves. They receive the same compensation that the stenographers of the House receive, while the stenographers on the floor of the House come here at 12 o'clock and remain until 5, when their work is practically completed, and the House reporters have the same vacation, from the close of one Congress until the beginning of the next Congress, or the close of one session until the beginning of the next session. I am certain that if the gentleman had given the investigation to this service that he should have done before proposing his amendment and making the criticism that he has he would have been convinced, as the committee is, that their services are worth as much if not more to this House than the services of the stenographers who report the debates on the floor of the House. They are engaged constantly. Take the Committee on Appropriations. For five weeks these stenographers, since we have commenced the consideration of the appropriation bills, have been working there every day, and take all of the hearings.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is referring to the stenographers who take the notes of the committee hearings?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. They are the hardest worked people about the Capitol. I am glad to have a chance to add my testimony.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio stated that some gentleman who gave his testimony before the committee was required to pay for the transcript.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, if that gentleman had waited until the next day he could have gotten it printed by the committee free of charge. I apprehend the reason the stenographer charged for it was because the gentleman wanted it right then and there.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Obviously; I said there was nothing wrong about the transaction at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that; but if the man had waited until the next day he would have gotten it printed free of charge.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Oh, that was my answer to the gentleman, that if he had waited a day he could have had it printed for nothing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to know of the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact well known by every Member of Congress that these four men work practically day and night from the beginning of Congress to its adjournment?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly, it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And that it takes a very high degree of skill in that profession to do this work?

Mr. TAWNEY. As high as the degree of skill required by the men who report the debates on this floor.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And this system was adopted as a matter of economy rather than to pay the regular rates.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. These assistants that these men have, are they paid by these stenographers or by the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. Paid by the stenographers.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When these stenographers are employed to do work during vacation I understand that they receive extra pay for their work.

Mr. TAWNEY. When they are working for the Government? I do not so understand it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, it is against the law for them to receive extra compensation from the Government for extra work done, as I am informed by the Reporter who is now taking down my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in answer to what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has just said. Fortunately or unfortunately I have had some experience, which has led me to know something of the work of these committee stenographers. I have no doubt that at times they perform arduous service. There is no question about that. Occasionally they may perform a long day's work, but it is not a usual and customary thing, according to my experience, that they are employed in the way in which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] says they are employed. Supposing they do employ some one to transcribe their notes after they have talked them into a phonograph, to be reproduced by the typewriter. That service is a comparatively cheap service. We who have employed young ladies to do that service know that it can be had for a comparatively nominal sum.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman not aware of the fact that the men who take the testimony before the committee of the House are required to have the highest class of ability that is demanded of any stenographer in any service. They must have technical and scientific knowledge in order to understand all of the terms used.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Oh, so far as technical knowledge is concerned, a large amount of it is not required. It requires no more scientific knowledge or technical knowledge, in my judgment, than it requires to take the notes of a witness in a court room, where all kinds of subjects are dealt with, as they are in Congress. In the State of Ohio for many years we have had our court stenographers, who, so far as I am able to understand, do far more work than do the stenographers before the committees. They were paid $1,200 per year, or $100 per month, and I know they were good stenographers; and I know further that there was no dearth of applications for those positions.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not also a fact that your court stenographers charged so much per folio for every line of testimony which they transcribed?

Mr. SOUTHARD. No; 30 cents a page.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, Mr. Chairman, the court stenographers of Ohio charge a ratio far beyond that which these men are being paid here.

Mr. TAWNEY. So they do in every State.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And every lawyer that tries a case in court and has to go to his client in order to get the money to pay for those expenses knows that fact.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Well, I have had a good deal of stenographic work of that kind done and that is not my experience. I want to say this, that I believe that in the State of Ohio or in any other State of this Union you can obtain competent stenographers by the hundred for $2,000 a year.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman believe there are stenographers by the hundred and five hundred capable of doing the same kind of work that these stenographers do?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to say during a number of years I had in my employ a stenographer who cost me less than a hundred dollars a month, and I know of a number of stenographers whose salaries do not exceed a hundred dollars per month, who, I believe, are superior in a general way to many of the men who are employed as committee stenographers of this House. I do not mean the present stenographers, but I mean many of those who have been employed here since I have been a Member of this House. It seems to me that we are paying most extravagant salaries for this work that we are getting done in the committees of this House.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow a question before he sits down.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would not compare the services of a stenographer of the House to the services rendered by stenographers in taking testimony ordinarily?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I have not been speaking of the stenographers of the House; I have been speaking of the committee stenographers, those who perform services for the committees of the House. Frequently I have seen two of these men employed in taking the testimony of a single witness who was before the committee, two stenographers presumably being paid $5,000 per annum each for the work which they were performing.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I do sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio will not be adopted. No substantial reason has been given why we should make a reduction in the salaries paid these four stenographers to committees. They are engaged in performing the same character of service that is done by the official stenographers upon this floor. During the session they work constantly through the day, frequently after the House adjourns, and sometimes long hours into the night. Why should they be paid less than they have been receiving for years? I must confess that I do not understand this spirit of economy which seems to have suddenly seized certain gentlemen upon this floor. The Committee on Appropriations have brought before the House this bill, which makes a larger reduction in the number of clerks and employees than any bill of like character that has been brought before the Congress for many years. It creates fewer new places and admittedly increases fewer salaries than any like bill brought before you for years. In this bill your committee has made a more earnest effort toward an equalization of salaries than has been made in any other bill of like character during the time that I have been in Congress. As a matter of fact, this is the first legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill that has been brought before the House since I have been here providing for an actual reduction of appropriations of the public money. I can not understand why it is that all of a sudden gentlemen here are apparently seized with a spirit of economy and move these reductions and raise these points of order. I must confess that, from my standpoint, it seems a belated spirit of economy. There must be something behind it; something I do not understand; some pique or some disappointment—I do not know what it is. I have been continuously absent from the floor of the House for about seven weeks attending the sittings of the subcommittee preparing this bill, where I have had opportunity to observe the labors of these stenographers whose salaries the gentleman is now trying to reduce. During all this time, for hours before this House convenes, these stenographers have been engaged at labor, and, as I have said, frequently after the House has adjourned. During this time I have not known all that has taken place in the House, but surely something must have happened. Something must have occurred that does not appear upon the surface to have aroused this belated spirit of economy which apparently has taken possession of certain gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Would he not be willing to undertake to furnish stenographers to do the committee work that is done in this House for a hundred dollars a month each?

Mr. BURLESON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the paragraph just before the one we are now considering we pay stenographers who do exactly the same character of work upon this floor exactly the same salary provided for these committee stenographers. Why should we make a reduction of the salary of stenographers who do the work for the committees, where they work just as long, where they work just as arduously, where they work just as efficiently? Why should we discriminate against them? Why did not the gentleman make this point against the official stenographers? Why did you not offer to reduce that item of the bill?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Why has the gentleman any objection to answering my question?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not understand your question. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I said could not the gentleman undertake to provide stenographers just as good as we have to do the work before these committees for a hundred dollars a month?

Mr. BURLESON. I feel quite sure that it could not be done, and I do not believe there is a man on this floor who believes that it can be done, save the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. During this present session of Congress these four reporters to committees have in one or two instances found themselves compelled to employ outside assistance.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not doubt it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the pay of these gentlemen they brought in here amounts not to a hundred dollars a month, but more than a hundred dollars a day in many instances.

Mr. BURLESON. I am prepared to accept the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You can no more find men who can do this work for $100 a month than you could obtain a competent engineer to run a railroad train at the price of a brakeman.

Mr. BURLESON. I agree with the gentleman, and insist that no sufficient reason has been given why these salaries as fixed in this bill should be reduced.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does not the gentleman believe that we could hire competent stenographers for $2,000 a year?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know what you can hire stenographers for in the State of Ohio, but I feel quite sure that you can not employ the character of stenographers that are required in the important committee rooms for any such sum.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is it not a fact, with our force of stenographers as it is now constituted, that there are extra services and that there must be extra stenographers employed?

Mr. BURLESON. That statement has no bearing on the issue you have raised by your amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. There have been seventeen committees of this House holding hearings on one day.

Mr. BURLESON. Seventeen different committees being served by stenographers? If so, unless these four committee stenographers are ubiquitous, I do not see how they could serve them all, and of course extra service would then be required.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I make no contention of that kind at all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he could hire a stenographer at $40 a month, but he would not get the class of stenographers they use in the committee rooms.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I can hire a stenographer for $15 a week who is superior to some stenographers who have appeared before my committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And I will guarantee you could not find one that would last fifteen minutes in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses, namely: For wrapping paper, pasteboard, paste, twine, newspaper wrappers, and other necessary materials for folding, for the use of Members of the House, and for use in the Clerk's office and the House folding room (not including envelopes, writing paper, and other paper and materials to be printed and furnished by the Public Printer, upon requisitions from the Clerk of the House, under the provisions of the act approved January 12, 1895, for the public printing and binding), $10,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to make this point of order against this item of $10,000. I will reserve it, and ask the gentleman from New York to explain it. This is different from the amount appropriated last year. Seven thousand dollars was appropriated in the legislative bill last year.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes, sir; and $3,000 in the deficiency in this session of Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let the gentleman make the point of order and we will have a deficiency.

Mr. LITTAUER. It simply leads to a deficiency. Our idea was to make a proper and ample appropriation for contingent expenses, based upon past years' experience, and submit such a fair sum to those who have to carry out the purposes of the House, with a view that they hold their expenditures within what we determine to be a proper sum.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that it is a fact for five years we have had this deficiency.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman does not propose to ask for $3,000 in the deficiency bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. I certainly do not. We practically have nothing to do with the asking for a deficiency of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives or recommending certain appropriations of the House appropriations, but it depends upon those whose duty it is to administer the appropriations for the requirements of the House whether it be used or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is the gentleman's idea that if we make this appropriation of $10,000 we will have no deficiency?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is the idea. The record shows that this has been done; and we thought it useless to take up the time of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For packing boxes, $3,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve the point of order on that. There is an increase in the appropriation for packing boxes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Because of the increased cost of pine lumber. We were advised that in order to get as good packing boxes as we did before we should have to add $500.

Mr. HARDWICK. Did the committee look into that question?

Mr. LITTAUER. We did.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman a question or two. I want to know what is the reason, if you know, that such inferior boxes are furnished the Members of the House of Representatives and such superior boxes are furnished to the Senate?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not looked into the quality of boxes furnished the Senate, but I did go downstairs the other day and saw three of the samples on which bids were to be opened for the supply of the House of Representatives, and I think them altogether superior to the boxes that I received when I first came here. I believe they are now well and strongly made, and ought to well serve the purpose for which they are intended.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would rather have one box of the kind furnished to the Senate for practical purposes than to have six of the things furnished us.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have never examined the Senate boxes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Why can not we have the same sort of a box?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The only way we can get them is to get into the Senate, and several of us have not been able to get there as yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is it absolutely necessary to get into the Senate to get one of those boxes?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you what the condition is. I have investigated the matter as a practical question. You take these boxes that we get and they are so flimsy in their structure—if that is the correct word to use—that when you fill them full of documents and stuff of that sort the sides spring apart so that you can not lock or unlock them with any sort of convenience unless you get down and put your knee against the front of it and press it in.

I went down here and got into a confabulation with the man who furnishes the boxes, and his explanation about it is this: That the Senators have their boxes made over there by a carpenter of their own. They give him directions to make them a certain kind of a box, while the House boxes are let out by contract.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Do they each cost the Government the same amount of money?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know whether they do or not, and to make a short answer, I do not care. [Laughter.] What you want is a box that will hold together. Now, these boxes we have, if you load one of them up to its full capacity with heavy stuff like books and documents and start it out as far as it is where I live—a thousand and odd miles—unless you reenforce the thing with ropes the chances are ten to one that it will burst open before it gets there.

Mr. LITTAUER. Are not our boxes better to-day than they were ten years ago?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think they are as good as when I first came here. The small white boxes are much superior to the redwood box, and whoever has charge of the boxes—I do not know who it is—ought to look into the matter and see that we get boxes of some kind that will hold together.

Mr. LITTAUER. I notice that the Senate pays $975 for the material for the boxes. Then it has carpenters to form the boxes—three carpenters, at $960.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much do we pay?

Mr. LITTAUER. For 321 boxes we pay $3,500, or we propose to pay that; we have been paying $3,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would rather have one box during each Congress that is a good one; that is serviceable: that protects the stuff that is put into it, than to have two or three of the boxes that I usually get. It is a matter of plain common sense.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York how he knows the cost of these boxes, and how this rise in material has been brought about by the increase of cost of pine lumber?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have been so informed by the gentleman who makes the contract for the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman, as a matter of fact, that we have two antitrust suits against the pine-lumber combination, one in Georgia and one in Mississippi, and I hope by next year we can get the boxes cheaper and better.

Mr. SIMS. Why are the redwood boxes made?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know. It has been the custom of the House that we should have three boxes—one red and two pine. We make this appropriation—there has been no criticism of the boxes made to us, or on the floor of the House, for some time. I am informed that years ago we did have a carpenter to make the boxes, and then they would hardly hold together.

Mr. SIMS. I understood the gentleman to say that he went down and viewed the samples; did it include the red boxes?

Mr. LITTAUER. It did.

Mr. SIMS. It isn't pine at all.

Mr. LITTAUER. No.

Mr. SIMS. It might as well be paper.

Mr. HAY. In view of the discussion that has gone on, I move to strike out the paragraph. I never could see any use in this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first inquire whether the gentleman from Georgia has made his point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserved it, and I now make it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. That the appropriation authorized by law at $3,000, and this item increases it $500.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think this is subject to a point of order. Here is a general appropriation for packing boxes. It is an object in progress, and is authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to ask the gentleman from New York whether these boxes are now in the course of construction?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe some of them must be. At least the lumber must be manufactured by this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be a somewhat liberal construction, but the Chair rules that this is a work in progress, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HAY. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22, strike out lines 21 and 22.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. HAY. I do not care to discuss the matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on this, because I have some of these boxes, and I think the appropriation is a proper one. I pack my official letters, my official papers, my official documents in these boxes, and I am compelled to do that going backward and forward attending sessions of Congress. These boxes are now filled with these papers, except such of them as I have deposited with the committees, and so forth. Now, I do not know whether these gentlemen have used their boxes or not. I can not do without them. Unless these boxes are furnished I will have to go and buy some boxes and pay for them out of my own pocket to carry my official papers and take care of them.

Mr. HAY. Is it not a fact that in the post-office appropriation bill which was reported to this House a day of two ago it is provided that only packages of four pounds or less in weight can be franked?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I really can not answer that question. I have not seen that bill. We all use these boxes in the manner I have stated.

Mr. HAY. I understand that to be the fact, so that you can not frank your boxes hereafter.

Mr. BURLESON. That bill has not yet passed.

Mr. HAY. That is a provision of the pending post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In reply to the gentleman's inquiry, I will say that I do not know whether that is the law or not. I remember that about the end of the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress—the first Congress of which I was a Member—I was notified by some official of the House that "your boxes are ready for you." I did not expect to be buried in them and I asked him what they were for, and he told me they were used for the purposes I have stated. I have those boxes now, unless they are worn out. I have several of them, all filled with these papers, either at my home office or at my office here in the city of Washington.

Mr. LITTAUER. Are they holding together?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are holding together.

Mr. LITTAUER. And you claim they are good boxes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes. One is better than the other. The last one was a cedar box. I have one good box and others that are not so good. I believe I have three in all.

Now, as to the 4-pound proposition that the gentleman speaks about, I do not know anything about that. Some officer of the House, I do not remember who, said I had a right to send those boxes home through the post-office.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The law which the gentleman from Virginia refers to has not yet passed.

Mr. HAY. I am talking about the provision in the pending post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I gave my boxes to the Postmaster of the House. He had them put on the House mail wagon and sent to the train, and they were carried and delivered to the post-office at Nashville, and I had them hauled from the post-office up to my office. If there is no law authorizing that to be done, then to that extent I have been disobeying the law, and if the Government has lost anything by it, I will try to have it made up out of my next salary, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.] But in all seriousness, the boxes are necessary for me, just as necessary as the envelopes in which I put the hundreds of letters which I write. If they could not be franked I would have to send them by express. Indeed, in one case I did pay expressage on one or two of those boxes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an explanation to the committee concerning the amendment contained in the post-office appropriation bill that was just referred to by the gentleman from Virginia. We do not seek to change the law in anywise as to the weight that may be mailed under the franking privilege, but merely to limit the use of the penalty privilege, which has been abused by the Departments in sending freightable matter through the mails in large quantities which should have been sent by freight. If that amendment is adopted by the House it will not limit in anywise the franking privilege which the Members have at the present time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, if we have the legal right to send these boxes through the post-office, as I have been sending them?

Mr. STAFFORD. The present law permits the Departments to mail any package under the penalty privilege, but Members of Congress are restricted in the use of the franking privilege to public documents, seeds, and the like, and letters relating to official business, which can be mailed in small or large quantities. They have not the authority to mail cows or pianos or such other matters as were alleged in an editorial in the Washington Post recently that Members of Congress were sending under their franks, but which upon investigation the committee found had no basis in fact whatsoever.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I have not mailed any cows or bedstead or pianos or anything of that sort. Absolutely nothing but official matter on official business. Of course, Mr. Chairman, these boxes should only be given the Members when they need them, and the law should so provide, and I shall vote for such a provision if we have no such law.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called to certain articles which have, from time to time, appeared in one of the leading journals of Washington, criticising a speech which I made on the comparative expenditures of Washington and certain other cities, and an effort has been made to discredit the figures which I presented.

Great stress is laid in these articles upon Bulletin No. 20 of the Census Bureau, and while the tables shown on pages 464, 470, and 476 of that document bear out the figures which I gave, yet I may state for the information of the House that the tables I presented were made up from the auditors' reports for 1904 of the cities with which I compared Washington a year later than the census document.

The method of refutation adopted is that which in legal parlance is known as "confession and avoidance." The chief matter of avoidance of these newspaper articles is to regard the remarkable differences disclosed by my figures, not as the result of municipal extravagance, but as differences growing out of the problems peculiar to Washington's condition. We are told that the conditions which surround Washington are unknown elsewhere. Other cities have easy sailing, while the condition of Washington is peculiar. There is some slight difference of names, and other slight differences of method, but the main conditions of municipal expense are about the same everywhere. A certain number of people in a given area have to be governed. It costs more in Washington than elsewhere in cities of the same grade. The reason is not attributable so much to these differences of condition as to differences in management and municipal control. But we have heard so often that Washington is the best-governed city in the world that at last we have come to believe it; and when a presentation is made disclosing enormous weaknesses of administration we find it difficult to believe; but when the presentation can not be denied, the next best thing is to avoid it.

In my speech I gave a table of figures showing gross expenditures of seven cities, and followed this by another table showing net or ordinary expenditures of the same cities. These figures are either right or they are wrong. That they were right is evidenced by the fact that they have not been denied. They stand unquestioned, except that census figures for 1903 are offered as a sort of buffer to ward off the force of my charge. Instead of acting as a buffer, however, they support every line of my indictment. My figures, however, were not taken from Census Bulletin No. 20 for 1903, a mere secondhand presentation, but were taken from the first-hand reports of the auditors or comptrollers of the cities named for the year 1904 and compared with figures taken from the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Every figure shows an actual expenditure of money as vouched by the auditing officers, whose duty it was to make the reports.

A definition was then given by me, a definition originated by these same auditing officers, by which the difference between gross and net expenditure might be ascertained. The total of ordinary expenditure was given by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as well as the total of gross expenditure, so that I had nothing to do but to set down this total in both places as the gross and the net expenditure of Washington. The auditors and comptrollers of nearly all of the other cities had made like distinctions, so that in those cases it was merely a work of transcription. In the few cases where these distinctions had not been made by the auditors it was easy to apply the definition and ascertain the ordinary expenditure for every city. Great stress is laid by them upon the difficulty which surrounds calculations of this sort, and a whole column has been devoted by the writer to let the people know how great a task I had attempted, how intricate it was to the uninitiated, and how absolutely I had floundered in my effort to clarify what the writer averred I did not understand.

Auditors have sworn duties to perform, and in certifying over their signatures to certain sums of money which they term gross expenditures and other sums which they term net or ordinary expenditures are but working to let the uninitiated know the truth about expenditures, however much it may be desired by some to befog and mystify the subject. These auditors also certify the constituent items which make certain figures representative of gross expenditures, and anyone by omitting these items may easily ascertain the net expenditure.

I gave the absolute totals for gross and net expenditures of the city of Washington and of six other cities. They were not percentages, but amounts. They were not deductions, they were facts. These figures showed, for gross expenditures, that Washington spent about $3,000,000 more than did Buffalo, a city that in 1900 had a population 27 per cent larger. They showed also that Washington spent almost $4,000,000 more than did Newark, N. J., a city of only 12 per cent less population. These expenditures show that Washington spent almost as much money as the city of St. Louis, a city of more than twice the population of Washington. That it spent almost as much as the city of Pittsburg, and a far greater amount in proportion than Baltimore or Boston.

In net expenditures the figures showed that Washington expended 32 per cent more than Buffalo and 36 per cent more than Newark; that St. Louis, though twice as large and with an area about equal to that of Washington, spent only 18 per cent more; Pittsburg, but 2 per cent more, and Baltimore, 34 per cent more.

They admit these totals and avoid their force by creating conditions which, as we shall see, exist only in the minds of their creators. Now, what are these special pleas of avoidance?

Special plea in avoidance, No. 1.—Here it is, as set out in the columns of the city paper:

> It (Washington) bears the cost of the judiciary from the highest to the lowest court, save the Supreme Court of the United States, whereas in the other cities only the municipal courts of high and low degree are paid for by the city.

Let us investigate these facts.

The auditor of St. Louis, in his report for 1904-5, names the courts for which that city pays expenses to cover the city and county in relation to the State. The courts named by him are:

> Circuit court, circuit court of criminal causes, court of criminal correction, and probate court.

The amount given by him as expenditure for these purposes, as paid by the city, was $160,994. The auditor for the District of Columbia for 1904 gave the expenditures for the courts of the District of Columbia, being "salaries employees, supreme court, court of appeals, and defending suits in court of claims," at $79,149.

It will thus be seen not only that this plea was false so far as St. Louis is concerned, but that the expense of the judiciary of the District of Columbia, despite the enormity of the disparity of conditions as set out by the critic, was the most rational of all the expenses of the District.

In addition to this the purely police-court expenditures for St. Louis were $124,879, while the same expenditures in Washington were $60,643. But this is not all. As further expense of the city of St. Louis, growing out of its relation to the county and State as paid by the city, the auditor notes the following seriatim:

Costs in misdemeanor cases	$38,000
Justice of the peace courts	94,866
Jury commissioner	25,160
Jury and witness fees	60,000
Jail	42,480
State Reform School, boys	15,000
State Reform School, girls	700
Convicts at State Lunatic Asylum	200
Probationary delinquents	5,200
Court-house and Four Courts building	35,837
In all for the administration of justice, exclusive of municipal courts	478,438
In all for the administration of justice, including municipal courts, $124,879	603,317

When these figures are set in contrast with the paltry figures which are paid for the administration of justice in the District of Columbia in all the courts of high and low degree, the absolute falsity of the claim that Washington pays an expenditure for this purpose which other cities do not becomes apparent. It also shows that the conditions surrounding Washington, so far as the administration of justice is concerned, are much more favorable that in St. Louis.

Special plea in avoidance, No. 2.—It is stated that "Washington is properly credited with expenditures which in other cities are made by county and State." The auditor of the city of St. Louis in the same report further sets out as expense of the city of St. Louis, and as paid out of the revenues of St. Louis, the further items growing out of its relation to the county and State, as follows:

Assessment of revenue	$75,800
Coroner's office	33,204
Eleemosynary institutions and charities: City dispensary, city hospital, female hospital, insane asylum, poorhouse, and house of refuge	652,426
Foundlings	15,000
Indigent pupils at State deaf and dumb school	600
Contingent fund	12,500
Recorder of deeds	57,739
In all	847,367

Adding to this the expense for administration of justice, $478,400, we have a total of $1,325,805 as expenditure paid by St. Louis for general expenses growing out of its relation to the city and county.

Evidently there was no data at hand and imagination was drawn upon for assertions which are worthless in the light of the data furnished by the auditor of St. Louis. I shall set out in an appendix the court and other expenses growing out of the relation of city to county and State for other cities, which will show still further the weakness of the statements made.

Again the statement is made that "the insurance department is everywhere except in the District supported entirely by the State."

This is a sweeping assertion, but, like the other assertions, is merely sophistical and contentious.

In the first place, the city of Washington expends but the trifling sum of $7,812 for this great bureau. The department of insurance is ordinarily located at capitals of States, and, unfortunately for the cities chosen by me for comparison with Washington, only one of these happened to be a capital. Therefore five of the cities had no such department, and therefore paid nothing for it. The city of Boston, however, is a capital, and I hardly think that so far as this city is concerned that the assertion is true. The auditor for the city of Boston in his report for 1904–5 certified to the people of Boston, the people directly interested in the matter, that that city had paid a lump sum of $925,800 as its proportion growing out of its relation to county and State. This sum was charged up to the city of Boston, and appeared in its gross and net expenditures, and to that extent negatives the sweeping assertions of plea No. 3.

St. Louis, although not a capital city, paid the State $1,711,312 to cover statutory obligations of the city in its relation to the State, and we suppose that this would include the infinitesimal obligation covered by the so-called "department of insurance." However, if the alignment of $7,812 will help my Washington critics to release Washington from the charge of extravagant expenditure I cheerfully concede it.

Plea in avoidance, No. 4.—

Other functions performed by State or county officers are here performed by officers of the District of Columbia. In respect of schools contributions are usually made by the State or county, if it be only to the extent of giving the normal school training for teachers, while in a number of cities there is State or county aid for city schools.

The objection to this plea is that it is altogether wrong, so far as the element of State or county aid for city schools is concerned. By State laws a State tax is levied for educational purposes upon city and country alike. In apportioning this money the city gets back in all cases a less sum than the tax amount paid into the State treasury. In no other way could public education for weak districts in the country be maintained. Large cities not only educate their own children but through this State tax educate the children of the rural districts. The amount received by the city from the State is not State aid in any sense of the term, but simply its pro rata part of the apportionment. No matter what this amount may be, it is charged up by the auditor in both gross and net expenditure, and as such appears in the figures given by me. The same argument applies to county aid. The richer cities of the county contribute through county taxation a sum of money which makes possible the public education of all the children of the county. So that in its last analysis the cities contribute through State and county taxes to State and county education, and receive back for their own educational purposes a less sum than was paid out. This sum, however, small or large, is expended by the cities and is audited regularly by the city officers as net and gross expenditure. The difference is made up by municipal taxation.

The auditor of the District of Columbia, in his itemized account of expenditures for 1904, nowhere brings into the account the item of normal schools. Hence, so far as the auditor's report is concerned, Washington bore no such expense, unless that expense be included in some other item. The total expenditure for schools in Washington for 1904 was $1,690,371.

The city of Boston sustains at the public expense of the city several very important schools unknown to the Washington schedule, and in 1904 paid out something more than $111,558 for its normal school instruction. The salaries paid to the Teachers' Training School of Baltimore was something more than $23,000. Buffalo also maintains its system of normal schools, which are paid for out of the revenues of the city. The normal department of the Pittsburg High School is supported entirely from the city revenues. Cleveland contributes $17,900 annually for the support of normal training, which is charged to city expenditures. The city of Cincinnati supports its normal schools for the training of teachers in the same way. The Buffalo City Training School for Teachers and the Buffalo State Normal School, although in the same town, are distinct institutions and supported from distinct funds.

Plea in avoidance, No. 5.—In these articles it is stated:

Again the charities and correctional institutions, including prisons and reformatories are here borne entirely by the District of Columbia, whereas in the cities generally they are carried chiefly and often entirely by the State or county.

This is another sweeping assertion, and, like the others, may be demolished by simple presentation of the facts. It will be admitted that the charities of the District of Columbia, as set out in the report of its auditor for 1904, have been well taken care of. The aggregate expenditure for this purpose was $379,265, and included the Reform School for Girls, Reform School, Garfield Hospital, Columbia Hospital for Women, support of convicts and prisoners, Board of Children's Guardians, Central Dispensary, Eastern Dispensary, Women's Clinic, Washington Home, National Association for Colored Women, Newsboys and Childrens' Aid Society, Washington Hospital, German Orphanage, Women's Christian Association, Young Men's Christian Association, Hope and Help Mission, Columbia Institution, jail warden, and St. Ann's Infant Asylum. Of this item $79,919 went for the support of convicts and prisoners and $2,000 for the jail warden.

Now, what have other cities done? The auditor of the city of Pittsburg for 1904 reported an expenditure for charities of $151,117 apart from their prisons, which were supported entirely at the expense of the city, but the exact amount of the expenditure can not be separated from the total. In Buffalo the expenditure for the poor was $120,535. This includes an item for hospitals, homes, and asylums of $57,000.

The city of St. Louis expends upon public charities and corrections, according to the report of the auditor for 1904, $910,524, being city hospital, new city hospital, emergency hospital, insane at State institutions, female hospital, insane hospital, poorhouse, house of refuge, jail, workhouse, care of foundlings, deaf and dumb, insane, reform and industrial, juvenile delinquents, and probationary system. Baltimore in 1904 expended $490,907 for ordinary charity and correctional expenses and $17,676 for extraordinary. Boston spent as follows:

City hospital, relief station, Haymarket Square, and convalescent home	$486,994
Children's institutional department	186,017
Insane hospital department	329,321
Pauper institutions department	213,429
Overseeing poor department	131,284

Besides this Boston paid something more than $900,000 to the State as its expense in its relation to county and State for courts, prisons, etc.

It will thus be seen that plea in avoidance No. 5 has no foundation whatever.

Plea in avoidance, No. 6.—

The District of Columbia, paying for filtration plant, sewage-disposal system, railway terminal, District government building, and other extraordinary improvements, can not be fairly compared with cities which have less extensive projects on hand.

The gentleman should have continued and said, to have made his remarks pertinent, that the cities cited by me had less extensive systems than Washington. Inasmuch as he did not do so it may be fairly inferred that all of these cities had equally as great an expenditure for these permanent improvements as did Washington. The tables for gross and net expenditure contain these very items, and in my speech reference was made to these things. The Commissioners in their report for 1904 put the net expenditures, exclusive of those for the water department and expenditures on account of special and trust funds, at $9,079,908. I used these figures in my speech. The auditor in his report places the gross expenditure at $10,257,547. The difference between these items is what the city of Washington pays for the extraordinary expenditure upon filtration plant, sewage disposal, etc., which expenditure, of course, is spread out over a number of years. The difference is $1,177,639. The difference between the net and gross expenditure of St. Louis is $1,184,985, and St. Louis has as many great projects as Washington. The difference between net and gross for Boston is about $10,000,000, for Baltimore about $4,000,000, for Buffalo about $1,100,000, for Pittsburg about $1,600,000. So that so far as the cities used by me for comparison are concerned they are every whit as public spirited as is Washington and are carrying upon their shoulders enterprises fully as stupendous as any of those adverted to by my critic.

I now propose to show a few of the expenditures borne by the cities I have named which are not borne by the city of Washington nor the District of Columbia.

FIRST. ELECTION EXPENSES.

Washington pays nothing for this purpose. In 1904 other cities expended as follows:

Boston	$162,470
Baltimore	107,685
St. Louis	164,000
Buffalo	23,473
Pittsburg	18,599

SECOND. EXPENSES OF LEGISLATION.

Washington pays nothing for this purpose, all the general legislation of the District being enacted by the Congress of the United States. In other cities the following amounts are paid to common councils and boards connected with these councils:

Buffalo	$49,148
St. Louis	38,446
Baltimore	55,739
Boston:
Aldermen	29,439
Council	21,546
Incidental	9,702
Committees	17,208
Common council	30,201

THIRD. PARK EXPENSES.

The grounds around the Capitol, the Congressional Library, Botanic Gardens, War and Navy Department, Weather Bureau, Experimental Gardens and Grounds, Agricultural Department, Department of Commerce and Labor are cared for at the expense of the United States alone. The Zoological Park and Rock Creek Park are cared for at the joint expense of the District of Columbia and the United States. The word "park" in Washington has a far different meaning to what it does in other cities. In Washington every little piece of ground in front of the residences along any street is called a park, and forms a part of the city's parking system. In addition to this, there are parks all over the city in kind like the parks of other cities.

The first species of parks, the grass plots in front of residences, so far as curbing and sidewalking is concerned, has its expense cast upon the District of Columbia, one-half of which is paid by the United States. As to the grass itself in front of these residences, the expense for its care is borne by the occupant of the premises. The immense stretches of ground around the public buildings, which form the chief part of Washington's real park system, has the expense of their care cast entirely upon the United States, while the Zoological Garden and the Rock Creek Park share their expense as hereinbefoce named. It will thus be seen that while Washington has many and beautiful parks their expense as to care is to a large part borne entirely by the United States, and only to a limited extent by the District of Columbia in connection with the United States. This is not true as to other cities, many of whom have parks and park areas equally as numerous and beautiful as Washington. These parks in other cities are exempt from all taxation, while in the District of Columbia a valuation is set upon them in the arrangement by which the United States pays into the coffers of the District of Columbia, as an assumed tax upon its buildings and grounds in the District, an amount equal to the amount raised by taxation upon all the other real property of the District. In other words, the United States pays one-half the taxes upon property in the District of Columbia, and in so doing pays the District of Columbia a tax upon large parking areas which in other cities are exempt and produce no revenue whatever. The following table will show what other cities are doing in this line:

Park department expenses in 1904.

Baltimore	329,491
St. Louis	192,495
Buffalo	153,713

FOURTH. POLICE EXPENDITURES.

The actual police expenditure for Washington in 1904 was $818,179, a greater amount than that paid by either Buffalo or Pittsburg. In addition to this, the Government of the United States appropriated sums approximating $300,000 for watchmen, exclusive of sergeants-at-arms and doorkeepers. Of this sum, $29,000 was divided in equal parts between the District of Columbia and the United States.

From all these considerations it appears that while Washington may have some expenses in kind unlike other cities, that other cities have also a series of expenses that are unknown to Washington. The tables outlined in my speech instead of being impaired by the comparisons forced upon me by this newspaper criticism, are reenforced thereby.

FIFTH. TAXATION.

There is a general impression throughout the country that the city of Washington, like all other cities, bears the whole burden of municipal taxation, and this impression has been created and fostered. This is not true. The Government duplicates without cost of assessment or collection whatever amount of taxes the District of Columbia raises upon its own account. In other words, the United States Government pays one-half of the taxes of the District of Columbia. Other cities are not so favored. The taxes from all sources raised in the District in 1904 were $4,707,236. The Government paid for that year $4,672,253.

This enables Washington to tax public buildings and parks; a thing other cities are not permitted to do. Buffalo has exempted property belonging to the following persons and corporations:

United States	$6,559,775
State of New York	3,849,595
Erie County	1,774,515
City of Buffalo	10,963,690
Public schools	3,963,000
Private schools	1,361,330
Religious corporations	9,631,080
Cemeteries	895,000
Charitable associations	1,860,000
Scientific associations	931,000
Pensionaries	261,000
Hospital	590,220
Miscellaneous	22,990
Total	42,527,825

The exempted property in Boston belonging to the city of Boston alone is more than $79,000,000.

The following is a list of exempted property in St. Louis:

Public buildings	$4,347,284
Parks	12,069,044
Fire department	995,000
Police department	1,048,000
Water	10,000,000
Harbor and wharf	290,000
Miscellaneous	1,067,000

This excludes all Government buildings and all school and church buildings, which are likewise exempt.

Washington in 1904 exempted for District buildings, churches, hospitals, and colleges the insignificant sum of $1,214,700.

The conditions, so far as the actual facts disclose them, favor Washington. All other cities have no guardian to whom they may appeal and upon whom they may cast an undue part of their legitimate expenditures.

From the facts and figures which I have presented it may be said that the reasoning process of my friend Mr. Deadwood, who, I understand, is the author of all unsigned articles, is about as corrugated as the wrinkles in my brow when I try to think, and the deductions of Mr. Deadwood are about as ambiguous and difficult to find the meaning of as it is to find what the De V. in my name stands for.

What a glorious thing is a beautiful bright star night when one looks up to the firmament of heaven, an illumined mass of celestial bodies! Astronomers on such a night are in their element, not merely defining one recognized group from another, but nominating each individual illumined heavenly body from another. At such times even the layman gazes heavenward in admiration, and with his limited knowledge picks out the North Star, the Dipper, and other known celestial groups, and at such times appreciates the true force and value of that passage in the Scriptures which says: "There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory."

The rays of light which in this article have been shed in the shape of criticism by the terrestrial luminary, generally so able and wise, are scarcely as long as one side of my mustache waxed out as I had it for the benefit of the ladies during the public school hearings. In fact, the difference between this terrestrial luminary in this instance and its celestial namesake is so marked that the terrestrial luminary reminds me of the perversion of an old nursery rhyme, which runs:

Twinkle, twinkle, little bat;
How I wonder what you're at,
Up above the world so high,
Like a tea tray in the sky.

I ought, I fear, even apologize to the bat.

I trust that those who are so fond of poking fun will realize that there is nothing personal in these last remarks, but that they are made purely in the spirit of jest.

I shall now, Mr. Chairman, having disposed of this matter, go and wash my hands and put on a clean suit of clothes.

APPENDIX NO. 1.

The auditor of Baltimore named the courts under State department expenses as charged to city expenditure as criminal, Baltimore City, common pleas, superior, circuit, orphans, juvenile, supreme bench, and justices of the peace, and placed the total expenditure at $186,409, for which he set out an itemized account.

APPENDIX NO. 2.

The auditor of the city of Boston certified $960,125 as expense paid by Boston, growing out of its relation to county and State, and which was included in the total net or ordinary expenditure of my speech.

Analysis of Census Bulletin No. 20:

General administration includes all expenses for departments and offices, as executive, legislative, law, assessments, collections, treasurer, statistics, city hall, elections, etc.

Notwithstanding Washington has no expense for collecting one-half its revenue and no expense for legislative office, nor elections, its per capita expense for general administration in 1903 was greater than Chicago, Baltimore, Cleveland, Pittsburg, or Milwaukee. (See Table No. 1.)

Its expenses for courts were greater than Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, Detroit, or New Orleans. (See Table No. 1.)

Police.—Notwithstanding the enormous amounts paid by the Government for police, which is not included in these figures, the per capita expense for police in 1903 was greater than in any city in the Union having a population of 300,000 or more, with the exception of New York. That is greater than thirteen of the largest cities of the United States, and if the amount paid by the Government be included, it will yield a per capita of $4.22, or greater than any city in the United States by 83 cents. (See Table No. 1.)

Fire.—The expenses for the fire department were greater than Chicago, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, and about equal to St. Louis, Cleveland, Pittsburg, and Cincinnati. (See Table No. 1.)

The expenses for health were greater than Chicago, Baltimore, Cleveland, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, Detroit, and New Orleans. (See Table No. 1.)

The expenses for public charities and corrections per capita were greater than any city in the United States. (See Table No. 1.)

The per capita expense for public highways was also greater than that for any city in the United States. (See Table No. 2.)

The per capita expense for public sanitation was greater than any city in the United States, except New York and Boston. (See Table No. 2.)

Public recreations per capita were greater than New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Cleveland, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, and New Orleans. (See Table No. 2.)

The aggregate per capita for schools was greater by more than 50 per cent than any city having a population of 300,000, with the exception of New York and Boston. (See Table No. 3.)

The per capita salaries for teachers was greater than any city having a population of 300,000, except New York and Boston. (See Table No. 3.)

The miscellaneous expense for schools was greater than any other city having a population of 300,000, except New York and Boston. (See Table No. 3.)

The per capita library expense was nearly double that of any city in the United States having a population of 300,000, and was only excelled by Boston, and in that city by only 1 cent. (See Table No. 3.)

ALASKA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. TILLMAN. I present a memorial remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 191) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska. I ask that the memorial lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 20, 1906.

The honorable the Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

As one long interested in the development of the district of Alaska, and now extensively engaged in commercial, transportation, and other business in the district, I desire to protest against the passage of the bill (S. 191) entitled "A bill to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska," for the following reasons:

First. This bill proposes that Congress incorporate the Alaska Railroad Company and grant it a blanket right of way from the Gulf of Alaska, at or near the head of Cordova Bay, to a point on the Yukon River within 2 miles of Eagle. In addition to this proposed railroad company, there are now four others, in one of which—the Copper River and Northwestern Railroad Company—I am interested, building or proposing to build the same field. These four companies have been duly incorporated under the laws of several States, have made or are making surveys of their proposed routes under the act of Congress approved May 14, 1898 (Appendix D, S. Doc. No. 142, 59th Cong., 1st sess.), granting a right of way through the lands of the United States in the district of Alaska. Some of these companies have completed more or less of the laying out and grading of the line or route by which they are to build, and at least one of them has definitely, with the approval of the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, located a considerable part of its permanent right of way. This proposed Alaska Railroad Company is the only company desiring to enter that particular field, asking of Congress special incorporation and special privileges in the shape of a right of way not taken under existing law. In view of the fact that four companies are now occupying or proposing to occupy the same field, an incorporation by Congress of any one is uncalled for and unnecessary. All of the other companies have been compelled to secure their incorporation under State laws, and are faithfully complying with the act of Congress referred to, and with the regulations of the Department of the Interior, found in the circular of the General Land Office of June 8, 1898, to secure their right of way. They have necessarily been to great expense of time, labor, and money in making and filing the surveys required by law, and ask only to be allowed to go ahead under existing law, and not be placed at a disadvantage in the same field by a road getting a special incorporation and special and extraordinary privileges and grants by Congress. In view of this progress already made without the aid of Congress, the only object this proposed corporation without an actual survey can have in asking for the great privilege of an incorporation and a right of way from Congress itself must be the money value of your indorsement of the whole scheme, including the personnel of the directory. With existing law granting ample opportunity and privilege of incorporation and right of way, Congress should not select one particular set of men and construct them into a corporation with higher powers and a higher position than is enjoyed by others.

The preamble setting forth the object of the bill states that it is to aid in the construction of a railroad in the district of Alaska. It is a mistake to say that such an act would encourage or aid railroad building in the district. On the contrary, it would in a measure kill all of the enterprises heretofore started and in course of accomplishment. The prestige of your indorsement of one particular company would dwarf all others in granting to that particular company all the fruits of what has been so carefully worked for by the others. If there is to be any respect to the act approved May 14, 1898, this proposed corporation should take its chances under that act, as all the rest of us have done.

AS TO THE BILL ITSELF.

First. On page 18, line 7, the bill confers a right of way from Cordova Bay to the Yukon River by the most eligible route that shall be determined by the company. No one else dare move until this company determines what it wants. It is a blanket right of way covering all the region.

On pages 21 and 22, section 2, the language of the bill follows closely the wording of the act extending homestead laws of Alaska, and grants to this proposed company not only 160 acres more than is given in the same act for "terminals," but also "mud flats or tide lands in front thereof."

Compare act of May 14, 1898 (Appendix D, S. Doc. 142, 59th Cong., 1st sess., p. 487): "Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed as impairing in any degree the title of any State that may hereafter be erected out of said district, or any part thereof, or the right of such State to regulate the use thereof, nor the right of the United States to resume possession of such lands, it being declared that all such rights shall continue to be held by the United States in trust for the people of any State or States which may hereafter be erected out of said district."

If you give this proposed corporation the ownership of the "tide lands" you thereby repeal the act of 1898 to that extent.

The aforesaid act of 1898, section 3 (Appendix D, S. Doc. 142, p. 487, sec. 3350), declares that a railroad which passes through any canyon, pass, or defile shall not prevent any other railroad company from use and occupancy of said canyon, pass, or defile for the purposes of its road, in common with the road first located.

If you will compare the proposed bill, page 23, lines 17, 18, and 19, you will see that the bill changes the whole scope of this provision of existing law by the insertion of the words, line 18, page 23, "upon such terms and compensations as are just."

Therefore the right to the canyon, pass, or defile, which you have declared shall be held in common and enjoyed by all, is here given to one concern, and no one else may pass over therein except "upon such terms and compensation as are just" to that concern.

That is the second amendment to the act of 1898 proposed by the bill.

Another change in the existing law proposed by the bill in this section is the omission of the words "and all shippers shall be entitled to equal accommodations as to the movement of freight and without discrimination in form of any person or corporation." (Sec. 3350, Doc. 142, Appendix D, p. 488.)

On page 25 section 5 of the proposed bill gives the proposed corporation the right to file a preliminary plat of its proposed route, "and said preliminary plat shall, from the time of filing the same, have the effect to render all the lands upon which said preliminary plat and route shall pass subject to said right of way."

Which is to say, that "right of way" passes absolutely to the company on the mere filing of a paper, which can be prepared in the company's office without a survey or without a single official ever having been on the ground.

Section 3352, Appendix D, page 488, requires "the preliminary map of location;" then in twelve months "a map and profile of at least a 20-mile section of its road, as definitely fixed," "and upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior * * * thereafter all such lands over which the right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such right of way."

The supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior is repealed by the proposed bill, the requirement of an actual survey of each 20 miles of road is abandoned, and the "right of way" is given away without even requiring the proposed company to produce evidence of its good faith.

The act referred to makes the completion of all railroads in the district mandatory in four years from the filing of the map of definite location, and on failure to complete within that time provides that the rights granted shall be forfeited.

The proposed bill extends the time for this proposed company to eight years, and the forfeiture clause reads thus: "The rights herein granted may be forfeited as to any uncompleted portion by Congress."

This proposed company is to have twice as long as other companies in which to do its work, and an appeal to Congress for clemency in case of its failure to complete its road.

By section 6 it is provided "That if said Alaska Railroad Company shall not complete and put in operation at least 20 miles of its said railroad within three years from the passage of this act, all the lands granted by this act shall revert to the United States." That is to say, if the proposed corporation builds 20 miles of railroad in three years, its title to all the lands, coal, terminal, and otherwise, herein mentioned, vests absolutely in the corporation.

We have noted that this company (section 2 of the bill) is to receive 100 more acres of land than other companies in Alaska for a terminal, and "the mud flats or tide lands in front thereof," and now, by section 10, "in addition to the terminal lands hereinbefore granted for railroad purposes, there be, and is hereby, granted to said Alaska Railroad Company 2,560 acres of public lands * * * together with the mud flats or tide lands in front thereof at its terminus at or near the head of Cordova Bay."

Two thousand five hundred and sixty acres more! and more "tide lands!"

This is a request for favoritism. The land laws have been extended to Alaska and opportunity is offered to this proposed company as well as others to avail itself of such laws. I can see no reason why they should be repealed for the benefit of this company, which, as yet, has no existence.

By section 11 of the proposed bill there is granted "to said Alaska Railroad Company one section of coal land in Alaska."

A section is defined to be 640 acres in the aggregate, and need not be confined to any shape—that is, it need not be 1 square mile of land.

This gift repeals the coal-land laws of the United States for the benefit of this proposed company; these laws are found on page 104, Document 142, heretofore referred to. I know no ground on which this proposed company can ask the repeal of the Revised Statutes of the United States on its behalf and for its sole benefit, for it has done no work, made no survey or other act to entitle it to the special benefits except to ask of Congress its consideration.

Other companies are mining coal in Alaska under the provisions of the acts of Congress which limit the locations of persons or associations to rectangular tracts containing 40, 80, or 160 acres, but it is proposed to give this proposed company by this bill four times as many acres in the aggregate as any other company may locate under existing law.

Not only this, but since a section need not be taken in a rectangular form, the limit to the amount of coal lands which may be taken under such a grant can hardly be estimated.

The Copper River and Northwestern Railroad starts at Valdez and goes over the Marshall Pass to the Copper River where it meets the right of way which the proposed bill would give to the Alaska Railroad Company. It has already completed and cleared all obstructions from a definite survey to this point of meeting and for some distance up the river. It has filed in the General Land Office a preliminary survey for that distance and a permanent survey for half the distance, the latter having been approved by the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior.

It has built at Port Valdez docks and other improvements, and has graded its right of way from that point to Keystone Canyon, 12 miles; it has about completed a very difficult piece of rock work through this canyon, a distance of 4 miles, and is continuing this work along its right of way as fast as the inclement winter season will permit. The financial arrangement for the building of this road—The Copper River and Northwestern Railroad—has been fully made, and its completion is assured.

I am informed that The Copper River Railroad Company and the Alaska Pacific and Terminal Railroad Company have on file in the General Land Office preliminary surveys covering 130 miles of their proposed routes, which would also be covered by the right of way asked for in this bill, and are fully prepared, financially and otherwise, to build their roads. The Alaska Central Railroad Company has already built and in operation 45 miles of railroad under the general law and has asked for no special act of incorporation.

There is no evidence on file in the Land Office to show that the proposed company, asking for these special favors, has ever been over its route with instruments; it has made no survey or measurements, as shown by the testimony of its chief engineer before the Committee on Territories, House of Representatives, February 1, 1906, page 60, Hearings on Railroads in Alaska.

In conclusion, I wish to reiterate that this bill should not pass unless Congress desires to put a cloud upon the titles of all these companies already at work in this region, which will be a menace for eight years to all railroad building in the country.

Respectfully, D. H. JARVIS.

DEPARTMENTAL INFORMATION AFFECTING MARKETS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask leave, on behalf of the conference committee, to withdraw the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10129) to amend section 5501 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks permission to withdraw the conference report on House bill 10129. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to say that following the suggestion made in the Senate yesterday a concurrent resolution will be prepared to remedy the defect. I trust I may be allowed to express the hope that at last we have a distinct precedent for the refusal of the Senate to concur in new legislation in a conference report; and I trust that in the future it will be exercised as strongly against measures that are less meritorious than the one which was presented by your committee yesterday.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I would ask the Senate this morning to continue the consideration of House bill 14171, there being one amendment proposed by the committee not yet disposed of. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] desires to speak to that amendment. I notice that he is absent from his seat, and therefore I will ask that the bill may temporarily go over. He will probably be in during the day.

In the meantime I will take this occasion to submit a statement as to the floating dry dock Dewey, about which inquiry was made yesterday.

For the floating steel dry dock Dewey, appropriations were made as follows:

Act of July 1, 1902 (Pulsifer comp., p. 380)	$200,000
Act of March 3, 1903 (Pulsifer comp., p. 411)	300,000
Act of March 27, 1904 (Pulsifer comp., p. 442)	725,000
Total	1,225,000

It was built after designs similar to those of the floating dry dock at New Orleans. It was constructed by the Maryland Steel Company at Sparrows Point, Md., on Chesapeake Bay, about 4 miles from Baltimore.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being House bill 12987.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, several days ago I prepared two amendments to this bill which I thought would greatly improve it. I did not indulge the hope that those amendments would be entirely satisfactory, either in form or in substance, to all who agree with me upon the main question, because no Senator can prepare any important bill or amendment which will meet the approval of all Senators. The utmost that I expected was that those amendments would become a basis for conferences and suggestions among those who sincerely desire an efficient rate-regulation law, and that out of those conferences and suggestions we would evolve a proposition which would command our united support.

In accordance with that view, I refrained from offering the amendments in the open Senate, and I took care that they should not find their way into the public prints of the country, because I felt that all ought to be consulted before any definite line of action was proposed. My plan was to submit that amendment to my Democratic associates, and after I had received the benefit of their wisdom and their advice, then to pass it to the Republican friends of efficient rate regulation for such suggestions in the way of omissions or additions or modifications as they might see fit to make.

I perfectly understood that in refusing to make those amendments public I would give people an opportunity to misrepresent them, but that consideration could not deflect me from my course, and I would still deem it best to withhold them, except for a statement which was made yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], which appears in the New York Sun of this morning, and which, I am told, also appears in the Chicago Record-Herald of to-day.

The Senator from Iowa asked yesterday if he could see one of those amendments and it was cheerfully shown to him, without any thought, however, that he would consider himself at liberty to discuss it in the newspapers. I am sure that he made his statement without due reflection, because I know that he would not ask to see a paper, which the author of it considered private, and then discuss the contents of it for the public.

I waive all question of propriety, but the statement of the Senator from Iowa requires that I should now submit these amendments to the Senate in order that intelligent men throughout the country may see how widely the Senator from Iowa misunderstands their scope and meaning. He is quoted by the New York Sun as saying, in reference to one of these amendments:

> It will never do. It leads us into a worse morass than anything yet proposed.

Then he specifically objects to my standard of a "just compensation," and declares that "it is thoroughly preposterous to try to determine what would constitute a just compensation."

Mr. President, when the Senator from Iowa characterizes the standard of a just compensation as a preposterous one he assails the fundamental law of this land. He seems to have overlooked the fact that the identical words which I have used, and to which he objects, and which he characterizes as preposterous, are taken from the Constitution itself. If I have erred in proposing as the standard for the Commission a "just compensation" for the service, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have erred in the company of the great and wise men who wrote and adopted the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and that I have erred in using words which have never before been criticised in the legislative or in the judicial history of this Republic.

I remind the Senator from Iowa that all the property which he holds to-day, all that I hold, and all that any American citizen holds is held under the single guaranty that it shall not be taken from him for a public use without a "just compensation." The Constitution does not say it shall not be taken without "a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative" price. It does not attempt to guarantee the profit of an enterprise by saying that the price at which the public may use it shall be a "fairly remunerative one;" but, without reference to the cost, it says that when you take it you must allow a just compensation for it, and that is what I have provided in this amendment.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is a man in this Republic who, if you put the question to him straight, will say that he wants the railroads to serve him for less than a just compensation. Perhaps there are men who would like to make the railroads serve them for no compensation at all, but they will not dare affront the common honesty of the people by saying so. Nor is there a railroad manager in all this land to-day who will admit that he wants the people who use his railroad to pay more than a just compensation for its use. Perhaps there are railroad managers who would like to take the entire consignment for the freight bill, but even that kind pay a tribute to honesty by claiming that all they want is a just compensation for their service.

Then, sir, if the shipper says he is willing to pay a just compensation, if the carrier says he only wants a just compensation, and if the Constitution says he shall have a just compensation, it looks to me like Congress can not go very far astray in saying that the Commission shall fix a rate which affords a just compensation.

The Senator from Iowa declares in this interview that my proposition did not take into consideration the subject of discriminations, which, after all, was the greatest evil.

The Senator from Iowa of course read the amendment hurriedly, and he doubtless did not compare it with the bill; and therefore it will probably surprise him when I tell him that there is not a line in the amendment which he read and to which he objects that changes the Hepburn bill in respect to discriminations in the least. It leaves that bill precisely as it found it in respect to discriminations.

Now, Mr. President, as to the amendment giving the carrier his day in court, we had not proceeded far enough with it to indicate the point at which it should be inserted in the bill. It was an expression to be considered and amended, if it was deemed necessary to change it. But in order that the country may see it precisely as the Senator from Iowa saw it, I intend to offer it without the change of a word and without the ordinary addition providing for the line of the bill at which it should be inserted.

The other amendment providing the standard had gone so far as to say where it should be inserted in the bill, and yet it, like the longer amendment, was tentative.

I submit them, Mr. President, and I submit them with the assurance to every sincere friend of this legislation that if he can provide a better one I will abandon mine and gladly join in the support of a better one. I have no pride of authorship, and I fervently thank God that I have never felt that petty jealousy which finds fault with all work except my own.

Mr. KNOX. I ask that the amendments may be read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments submitted by the Senator from Texas will be read at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 of the bill, line 19, after the word "what," strike out all down to and including the word "prescribed," in line 5, on page 11, and insert the following:

A rate or charge which shall afford a just compensation to the carrier or carriers for the service or services to be performed, and a regulation or practice which shall be just and reasonable. The rate or charge, regulation, or practice so determined and prescribed shall be the only lawful rate or charge, regulation, or practice, and the carrier or carriers shall not thereafter demand or collect any other rate or charge or follow any other regulation or practice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The second proposed amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any carrier or person or corporation party to such complaint and dissatisfied with the rate or charge, regulation, or practice so established and prescribed may file a bill against the Commission in any circuit court of the United States for the district in which any portion of the line of the carrier or carriers may be located, alleging that such rate of charge will not afford a just compensation for the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable, and if upon the hearing the court shall find that such rate or charge will not afford a just compensation for the service or services to be performed, or that the regulation or practice is unjust and unreasonable, it shall enjoin the enforcement of the same: Provided, however, That no rate or charge, regulation, or practice prescribed by the Commission shall be set aside or suspended by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order of the court. Said proceeding shall have precedence over all other cases on the docket of a different character, and the court shall have power to make orders to secure the attendance of persons from any part of the United States, and the existing laws relative to evidence and proceedings under the act to regulate commerce shall be applicable. Either party to said proceeding shall have the right to appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, and such appeal shall have precedence in said Supreme Court over all other cases of a different character pending therein.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to occupy only a minute or two of the time of the Senate.

I need not say to my honorable friend from Texas that there is nobody in this Chamber who has a higher regard for him or a greater admiration for his abilities. I will add that I had no impression that there was any secrecy or anything of a confidential nature in these amendments. I had heard them freely discussed and talked of in the Senate for a long time. I have seen them discussed in the newspapers. Only a few days ago a very able lawyer in the State of Texas, which my friend so ably represents here, wrote me giving a rather particular account of what was in the mind of my honorable friend.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course the Senator refers to Judge Cowan——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. With whom I have discussed this question on more than one occasion; but neither Judge Cowan nor anybody else outside of the Senate, so far as I know, ever saw this amendment which the Senator read yesterday. I will say to the Senator besides that I made but one copy of it here, because I felt that everybody was entitled to see it and criticise it before it was given to the public; and that copy the Senator from Louisiana had and showed to the Senator yesterday.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I did not know the exact status of this amendment. I had heard it discussed so freely and had had it, in its substantial provisions, brought so repeatedly to my attention, that I confess I did not understand its secrecy, and can not understand now how a matter should be shown to everybody and its privacy preserved. I have not been able to accomplish that result even after a good deal of effort. On the whole, it is not sure that it would be a desirable thing, even if it could be accomplished. But I desire to disclaim any intention to embarrass and certainly any intention to disturb the feelings of my friend.

It is never pleasant to plead the privileges of a person who has been overtaken by the energy of the newspaper press. After a good many years in this Capitol, I have never had occasion to seriously complain of any report of anything I have said; but it is due to me, in view of what my honorable friend has said, to state that the conversation upon which the interview was based occurred yesterday evening as I was trying to get out of the door and occupied only the few moments of time. While I have not read the report or had my attention called to it, I see by the portion which my friend from Texas has read that, without going any further, it is rather a fragmentary and imperfect presentation of what I tried to say. My impression is that, although I would not be sure, the enterprising correspondent who interviewed me himself stated what the position of the Senator from Texas was, but my impression may be wrong about that. I certainly had in my mind no intention to betray any of the secrets of this Chamber.

My objection to the amendment was not one that need arouse any acrimonious spirit of controversy. As one Senator the other day, in a very able speech—I think the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the colleague of my friend—pointed out, there has been for many generations, both at common law and in the statutes of all English-speaking countries, one standard to which railway rates are to be referred test their lawfulness. That standard is embraced in the phrase "just and reasonable."

I confess more than a passing interest in the suggestion of the junior Senator from Texas, that that time-honored phrase should be abandoned—a phrase taken out of its surroundings in the Bill of Rights and put into the body of this law as a standard to govern the Interstate Commerce Commission. My objection to it is based altogether upon the fact that it is an impracticable standard. It is impossible for a commission or a court or a railroad or anybody else to tell in advance whether a rate is reasonably compensatory—that is to say, whether it affords a reasonable profit on the cost of the service.

Of course, there is very persuasive influence in the words of the Constitution, that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," but my honorable friend from Texas, I think, will not dispute the fact that there is at least a question whether that language refers to the service of a railroad in respect to a particular rate.

The property of a railroad that may not be taken for public use without just compensation can not be defined by the action of a commission in respect to a specific rate. It is well known to everybody that very many of the rates made by railways themselves do not pretend to afford a compensation for the service that is rendered in that particular case. Every railway schedule is full of sacrifice rates, made for the purpose of eliminating business in some other department. No great railway system pretends to make every rate which is in its schedule compensatory in any practical sense of the word. The great railway systems, which are continental in their scope, confessedly carry goods from one sea coast to the other, not on the basis of what is a just compensation for the service, but because they must carry at that rate or not carry the goods at all. So that, as a practical proposition, it will be perceived that in departing from the old standard of "just and reasonable" and creating a new standard, a just compensation for a particular service, you contradict the whole scheme of railway rate making.

It must be considered that no railroad can know in advance, with certainty, whether a rate it fixes will be compensatory for that particular service. For that reason no commission could properly be charged with the duty of finding out what the cost of the service is in a particular case, and no court of justice has any facility to determine any such question.

I have been interested in reading a little book entitled "The Elements of Railway Economics," by Mr. W. M. Acworth, printed at Oxford, England, last year. Mr. Acworth is, in many respects, one of the most intelligent students of practical railway problems that there is in the world. He has been a lecturer in one of the great institutions of learning in England, and last spring had the kindness, while the Committee on Interstate Commerce was in session, to appear before that committee and bear very interesting and very valuable testimony. I desire to read from page 51 of that little book a statement of Mr. Acworth, which I believe will be verified by the practical experience of nearly everybody. He says:

> Once we have grasped these fundamental facts, we can promptly get rid of not a few popular fallacies as to the equitable basis of railway rates.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I should be obliged to the Senator from Iowa if he would explain to the Senate what the court does under the Hepburn bill except to determine whether the railroad has received just compensation.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will come to that in a minute.

Mr. RAYNER. That is the fifth amendment of the Constitution, as I understand it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Acworth continues:

> Volumes have been written to show that railway rates ought to be based on cost of carriage. For two generations parliamentary committees and royal commissions have been implored to compel English railways to charge on this basis. Whether it is desirable that railway rates should be so based is a question to which we shall need to recur at a later stage. It is simpler to say at this point that such a basis is impossible, as no one knows, or can know, what the cost of carriage is.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator not know that this eminent authority, from whom he reads, declares that the express business in this country is done by the Pullman Company?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am not aware of that.

Mr. BAILEY. It is true.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have read this book with some care, but I have not found that.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is not in that book. I have not read that book.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have heard that statement made as a jest at the expense of an English traveler, but I do not think it interferes with his general authority as a student of railway economics.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator will find that Mr. Acworth says the express business in France is done by a company whose French name he gives, and in the United States it is done by the Pullman Company. I will ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to give us the benefit of his suggestion also.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that other writers on railway economics have advanced the same proposition, that because of the complexity of rate making it is impossible to tell what is a just compensation in the case of any particular rate standing by itself.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have not finished. The writer then goes on to point out why it is impossible to take up a particular railroad rate and tell in advance whether it will afford compensation for the service involved in it or not.

Mr. Acworth adds:

> It comes, therefore, to this: That even if it were, which it is not, possible to say what it would cost to carry x units of traffic, no one could so fix a rate as to obtain precisely the cost plus a determined percentage of profits, because the percentage of profit varies enormously according as the actual volume of traffic carried recedes on the one side or the other from the assumed volume x.

I will add to what my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has said, that numerous writers lay down the same proposition, and I believe there is no authority in the English language which does not concede that in the case of a particular rate it is impossible either for a railroad or for a commission or for a court to tell certainly in advance whether the compensation in that particular case will or will not produce a just compensation. The reason is that the human mind has no faculty that enables it to find out what the cost of carrying a particular article a particular distance is, such is the complexity of the railway system; and no system of statistics or accounting or expert investigation has ever fathomed the question which my honorable friend proposes to present to the Interstate Commerce Commission to the exclusion of all other considerations which affect the case.

I do not agree with the Senator from Texas that every railroad rate must afford a compensation for the particular service involved in it in order to avoid the prohibition of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States to which he alludes. That amendment, as I understand it, guarantees the integrity of the railway property, and the question of just compensation would not arise unless a showing was made that, on the whole, this order of the Commission had so interfered with the earnings of the company as to invade the integrity of its property.

I do not believe that my honorable friend, who I am sure is earnest and sincere in his anxiety to secure railway rate legislation—and I will add that no man has contributed more to the argument in behalf of the people on this question than the Senator from Texas—will, upon reflection, put upon the Commission the task of doing an impossible thing. If he does that, I trust that he will leave the work of the Commission to stand as in some sense a finality in the matter.

Yesterday or the day before the Senator from Texas paid a magnificent tribute to the ability of an expert railway commission, composed of great business men, with experience and practical knowledge, and to their superior capacity, compared to our judges, to pass upon rate questions. Now, if it is his purpose to bring these railway rates to the test of whether the compensation is just in a particular case, I beg of him to leave the decision of the Commission to stand as the law governing that particular case.

I can not—and I used the word "morass" in that interview, hurried as it was, in no objectionable sense—I can not imagine a worse situation for the public or for the railroads than the proposition the Senator from Texas suggests. He puts upon the Commission the duty of solving an insoluble problem, and then passes their answer to the question over to the courts to determine whether the Commission has solved it correctly or not. It is to be feared that it will turn out a difficult and ineffective scheme.

I agree with my honorable friend that there ought to be a fair and full conference in this Chamber as to this matter. I have been greatly interested, so far, in the debate that has gone on here. It has illuminated this question from a variety of standpoints. There is no doubt that the debate will continue to throw light and interest upon this great problem; but in our anxiety to reach harmony and unity of action, I do not desire to lose sight of the main issue, and I do not intend to do so if I can help it.

There are two questions presented here, both of which can be defended. One of them has been presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who proposes to take every railroad rate that is complained of directly into the court to be adjudicated; and the other has been presented by the bill which comes to us from the House of Representatives, which proposes to put these disputed railway rates before a great expert commission and charge them with the duty of investigating them and deciding them, taking into consideration every question that may properly enter into it, not only the cost of service, but every other question that may be properly involved in the formation of a railway rate. That proposition can be defended. But there is hovering here in the air of this Chamber a proposition which can not be successfully defended, and that is to create a great commission, with great salaries, and give them experience and learning and wisdom to discuss and to determine a practical question like the fixing of a railway rate—give that jurisdiction to the Commission, allow them to exercise it, and then solemnly transplant the entire controversy to be redetermined, rejudged, and redecided by a circuit court of the United States. That proposition, in my humble opinion, can not be defended. I do not deny that much can be said of a most persuasive character about it; but when people get down to a determination of this question, very few, in my judgment, will hold that the court ought to be made the ultimate arbiter in these railway disputes, for the very minute a man reaches the opinion that the court ought to be the ultimate arbiter, that very minute he ought to go to the support of my honorable friend from Ohio, who has a proposition pending here to make the court the sole and original judge in these disputed questions.

I do not care, Mr. President, at this time to say anything further, except again to disclaim any intention of hurting the feelings of the Senator from Texas or disturbing the proprieties which ought to prevail here. I certainly have not done anything or said anything except with the most sincere good will toward the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Iowa did not need to make that disclaimer, because I anticipated him in it and declared that I was satisfied his statement was made without understanding the situation as it appeared to us. I can not, however, accept the Senator's reasons for objecting to the amendment as readily as I accept his disclaimer. When the Senator says that for the court to determine what is a just compensation is an "insoluble problem," he declares, in effect, that every citizen in the United States holds every dollar's worth of his property subject to a rule which is not reducible to a reasonably certain human standard. If we accept his statement that it is impossible to determine what constitutes a just compensation, then every man within the jurisdiction of this Republic holds his property by an insecure and shifting tenure. If what the Senator has said is true, the railroad can file against him or me a bill to condemn the home where our children were born, to appropriate the farm which holds the ashes of our ancestors—can condemn and apply them to its use; and yet this test established by the Constitution for our protection is incapable of fair enforcement.

Let me tell the Senator that, after all, the only way in which to sustain the law authorizing the public to take any person's property—and under the law a railroad corporation is a person and entitled to the protection of its property rights—is by paying it a just compensation. If "a reasonable and fair compensation" does not mean at least as much as "a just compensation," then Congress would be without authority.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa does not understand this question as I do, because he spoke of a profit. It is immaterial to me whether a just compensation nets the railroad a profit or a loss. What the railroad is entitled to receive is a just compensation for the service; and the right of the railroad to receive it imposes upon the man who uses the railroad an obligation to pay a just compensation for the service. If the railroad company, through extravagance and mismanagement, can not so construct and operate its property as to serve the public for a just compensation, that is the loss of the people who built or buy the railroad. If the railroad company can construct it and operate it in such an economical way as to give good service for a just compensation and then have a profit, that is the good fortune or the good judgment of the men who construct, operate, and own the railroad.

When the railroad comes to condemn my property—and I derive much of my view upon this whole question from that original circumstance of the right and power of the railroad to take my property—when the railroad reaches my home and seeks to condemn it, what is the test? Not what I paid for the property, because if I bought it for less than it was worth the railroad is not entitled to the advantage of my bargain, and if I paid a foolish price for it, I can not shift to the railroad the burden of my mistake. It is competent for the railroad, or it is competent for me, to prove what I paid for it, but that is not conclusive. The test is, What is it worth? What is the market value of it, if it is a property which has a market value.

That there is a practical difficulty in reducing market values to an exactness every lawyer understands. How often is it that you summon from their homes and their pursuits a jury composed of twelve good and lawful men. You put them on oath to try the case; then you put the witnesses under oath to give the evidence upon which the jury must decide it; you put the judge under oath who delivers the law according to which they must apply the evidence; and yet all of these men, each alike striving to do his duty, will differ as to what is a just compensation for your property. How often have we known juries to compromise their verdicts in such a case. One man believes the property is worth a thousand dollars, another man believes it is worth $2,000, and between these two extremes there are perhaps ten other opinions; and yet, as sensible, honorable, just-minded men, charged to perform their duty, they arrive, not at the exact truth, because that is not required in the ordinary affairs of this world—it is not required because it is not attainable—but these men arrive at the truth as best they can, and probably render a verdict assessing the value of the property or allowing the just compensation at $1,500. That is $500 less than the highest estimate and $500 above the lowest estimate; yet I have never heard it suggested that we ought to abolish the trial by jury in such cases because every man on the jury could not measure the recovery in exactly the same sum.

When the Commission comes to determine what is a just compensation for a service, I have no doubt that the several members of the Commission, just as several members of a jury, will differ as to the exact amount which ought to be allowed; but does the Senator from Iowa save us from that difficulty by prescribing a just and reasonable and a fairly remunerative rate? Will not the same learned and upright men differ among themselves as to what is just and reasonable and fairly remunerative? The Senator encounters the precise difficulty in one case that he does in the other.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator from Texas will observe, the test of the rate fixed by the Commission in the House bill is not the question whether the rate will be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative, but what, in the judgment of the Commission, would be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate. I observe that those words "in the judgment of the Commission" appear to be omitted in the amendment of my honorable friend.

Mr. BAILEY. And I omitted them deliberately to avoid a legal danger.

Mr. DOLLIVER. So that, under the amendment, the Commission is required to find what a just compensation is, and, for fear they will not do it accurately and correctly, the courts are given an appellate jurisdiction practically to review it.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall address myself to that question a little farther on, and I think I can make it plain that, if some such provision is not made or does not exist without the making of it, the bill would not be worth the paper on which it is written. You can not deprive a man in this country of the right of a trial in the courts for his property.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] stated in respect to that feature of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas this morning, as well as that feature of the bill which I introduced some weeks ago, referring to the right of any party interested in the controversy to appeal to the courts, that that was a position which was wholly indefensible, and that anyone who stood for that had better accept the bill proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to give the courts jurisdiction of the matter in the first instance.

I intend later on to address myself to that proposition, but I should like the Senator from Texas when he comes to that point, as he says he will, to press upon the Senator from Iowa to know then what do these words mean in the Hepburn bill, if it is not intended that this controversy can be transferred to the courts? If I may be permitted to take the time——

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I read from page 14 of the bill, commencing at line 8:

> The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, and the orders of the Commission shall take effect at the end of thirty days after notice thereof to the carriers directed to obey the same, unless—— > unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Now, unless what?—

And also, if you will permit me to finish, on page 17, reading from line 10:

> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States—— > to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district, etc.

Brought for what?—

Now, in conclusion, I wish to say if there is anything in relation to this proposed rate legislation that is thoroughly misunderstood throughout the country it is this. You stop ten men on the street, and nine of them will tell you that there is a party here contending for the right to review the orders of the Commission in the court, and there is another party contending that the orders of the Commission shall be final. I say the real issue here is between this absolutely recognized, unrestricted jurisdiction of the circuit courts in the Hepburn bill and the restrictions proposed to be placed upon it both by the amendment of the Senator from Texas and the bill I had the honor to propose to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I need not add anything to the very clear and excellent statement which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just made. When it is suggested to the friends of the Hepburn bill that a man can not be denied his day in court under the Constitution of this country, because to do so would be to deprive him of his property without due process of law, they tell us that the Hepburn bill recognizes his right to go into court. And then when we propose to limit the right which they recognize, they fill the air with indefinite suggestions that somebody is trying to confer too much power upon the judicial tribunals. What inconsistency!

I do not believe there is a lawyer in the Senate—certainly there is not a lawyer who ought to be in the Senate—who will contend that you can pass a law authorizing the public to take any person's property and deny the person whose property is taken a right to try the justness of the compensation in the court, because that would be taking property without due process of law.

When we say that, the proponents and the defenders of the Hepburn bill say they recognize every man's right to go to court. If so, then I ask, in the name of ordinary, every-day, common sense, why should grown men wrangle over the question as to whether they will leave the right to resort to the court understood or express it in plain words?

When the Senator from Iowa intimates that I am proposing to give the courts a larger jurisdiction than the Hepburn bill, I remind him that he is on record, with other distinguished Senators, as declaring that the courts have, independently of and beyond the power of Congress to deprive them of it, the right to interpose at any stage of the proceeding to prevent the Commission from fixing too low a charge at which the railway must transport our property. I challenge that statement of the law; but they are right, and if we can not abridge the power of the courts and we leave it without an effort to define it, it is not only as broad as the jurisdiction which Congress has given, but it supports the view maintained by some lawyers, that the court then possesses all the jurisdiction that Congress could give it over the subject. It is therefore true, absolutely true, that both the bill introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the amendment which I have proposed limit the extent of judicial inquiry more than the Hepburn bill.

There is a difference between the provision of the Senator from Pennsylvania and my own. He recognizes the right to suspend by an interlocutory order of the court the rate fixed by the Commission, and I expressly deny that right. I think that is a difference of vast importance, but it is not one which I propose to discuss at this time.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I doubt whether the Senator from Texas meant exactly what he said. As I understood him, he said he denied the right of the courts to suspend the order. I do not understand that to be his proposition. I understand his proposition to be that it is within the power of Congress to deny the right of the court to suspend the order.

Mr. BAILEY. I used the word "deny" there in the sense that the bill deprives them of the right, and not in the sense that I deny their right to issue the injunction if not expressly forbidden to do so. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that expression, because it might have left the same impression upon the mind of somebody else, though the word "deny" can be used, as he knows, with accuracy in either sense.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have him give us the benefit of his opinion as a great lawyer as to how it can be possible to differentiate or separate the two classes of appeals. If the railroad goes into court upon the plea of unreasonableness or unjustness or unfairness, that is one thing. If the railroad goes into court upon the plea of confiscation, that is another thing.

Now, I am deeply concerned, and I hope every other Senator here is, that the roads shall not be permitted to get into court upon the plea of confiscation when they have no just reason for doing it, while I am perfectly willing for them to go there if they have an honest purpose in doing so.

As I understand the Senator's purpose in denying to the courts the right to suspend the order of the Commission, it is to allow them to litigate either proposition, but to give to the shipper the benefit of the doubt that the action of the Commission is just and reasonable, and that the courts shall not have the right to suspend the order until the Supreme Court shall have declared that the railroad has a valid reason to complain of the justness of the order.

I should like the Senator to point out, if he can—and no doubt he can, if anybody can—how we shall differentiate these two classes of cases on appeal.

Mr. BAILEY. The only possible way to protect the Commission and to protect the people against frivolous suits instituted in bad faith is to provide that the court can not set aside the rate until the question has been fully adjudicated. Of course, you can not look down into the heart of a suitor when making allegations that his lawful rights are impaired or about to be sacrificed and determine whether he acts in good faith or not. But the most you can do—and I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that that is one of the chief purposes of this limitation—the most you can do is to say that no court shall suspend the order until a final hearing, and thus no frivolous suit can do much harm.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just want to mention in this connection what the Senator mentioned yesterday, and that is that railroad officials do not seem to be very scrupulous about making oaths, as is illustrated by the letter from the gentleman in Florida, where, in an effort to get an injunction, some railroad official had sworn that the value of the property was five millions and something, and when he returned the same property for taxation swore it was worth only a million and a quarter or a million and a half. We must guard against the possibility of some railroad man doing some lying around here.

Mr. BAILEY. The railroads, like everybody else who must employ a great number of people, can always find somebody with an elastic conscience.

I had not any thought of discussing this question in any respect to-day, and I am not going to continue more than a moment, because at some other time I hope to present my views at length, but I want——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Pennsylvania have both made the statement that the amendments offered by each are restrictive of the right of review rather than an enlargement of that right. I confess my inability to understand that to be the case, and I want to ask the Senator from Texas if this is not the law: Where Congress, either directly or through a Commission, shall prescribe railroad rates, those rates will stand unless some specific provision be made for a review by the court, and they may not be assailed or attacked in court unless they amount to what we have become habituated to call "confiscatory," or noncompensatory to the degree that they amount to the taking of property without just compensation? Therefore if no provision be made in the bill for a review, no review can be had unless the rate fixed drops below the point where it will amount to that compensation which the carrier is entitled to receive for the use of its property.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as well as that offered by the Senator from Texas, proposes to enlarge that right of review and extend it to all orders, the Senator from Pennsylvania providing that security shall be given, the Senator from Texas prohibiting any injunction being issued under any circumstances to suspend an order of the Commission.

I beg pardon for taking so much time, but I have to take time in order to explain my position. It seems to me that the contention is incorrect that the amendments offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Texas are restrictive of the right of review. They are an enlargement of the right of review; and it seems to me that can be demonstrated.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Oregon will not so contend when he reads my amendment. The amendment limits the right of the court to an inquiry into the justice of the compensation or the reasonableness of the regulation. I want to say to the Senator, and I want to say it in the presence of every Senator, that if there was no constitutional provision I would never vote for a law that authorized one man to use another man's property without paying him a just compensation. I have no patience with this idea which would make one man serve another without giving him fair compensation for his service.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I will join hands with him on that proposition, and I will never vote for such a law—that is, if I know it when I am doing it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator does not "know" when he said a moment ago that my amendment enlarges the power of the court. I suggest to the Senator that he read it.

Mr. FULTON. I may not understand the Senator's amendment. This is my proposition: That unless a provision be made for a review, in the law or by some other statute, no review can be had by the court unless the rate established by the Commission amounts to confiscation or a taking of property without just compensation. Therefore, in view of the fact that we can not deny the railroads or the transportation lines the right of review or the right to appeal to the courts in a case where the order of the Commission would amount to a taking of their property without just compensation, to give them a right of review in cases other than that is certainly enlarging the right of review. The bill as it comes from the House and as reported by the committee does not deny them the right to go into court when their property is about to be confiscated. It could not deny them that right. We have no power to deny them that right. That is a right they have under the Constitution and we can not take it away from them; but that is the only right they have under the bill as it now stands. The Senator proposes, as I understand his amendment, to give them greater rights—that is, to grant them the right of review in every instance when dissatisfied with the order of the Commission. Consequently he must be enlarging the right of review.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator does not understand it; that is all; and that is a sufficient reply at this time. The Senator, upon an examination of the bill and a comparison of it with the amendment I have offered, will concede what I say; but if, after he examines and compares the two, the Senator then insists upon the view he has here expressed, I will be glad to debate it with him.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator answer this question? Does the Senator think Congress could prohibit the right of review where the rates established were confiscatory in their character?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not like the word "review." You can not deny to any man in this country the right to protect his property by a trial in court. I prefer to consider it an original proceeding. The court has said that you can authorize courts to review what has been done by other tribunals; and, although you miscall it an appeal, it matters not what you call it, the real question is, What is the nature of the proceeding? I dislike the word "review," and I have objected to it throughout all this discussion.

My own opinion is that every fair-minded man in this country is willing for every other man to have a fair trial of his property rights. All I contend for—and that is the entire abridgement of that right which I propose—is that the court shall not suspend what has been done by the Commission until there has been a fair trial, and because I propose that, the Senator from Oregon and others say that I am proposing what the Constitution does not warrant. I am perfectly sure that the right to a trial, sacred as it is, only means that you must give a man his day in court; that is all. The amendment I have proposed does that, but I believe that until that day shall come, and until a full hearing shall have been had, it is perfectly competent for Congress to provide that the rate established by the Commission shall be the only lawful rate.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement while the Senator is upon this subject. It seems to be inevitable that a court can take jurisdiction of any act passed upon this subject and will deal with this matter after we leave it. That being the case, the great difficulty which seems to exist in the administration of the law is that of delay. These two facts, one of law and one of actuality, being true, and all desiring to provide a proper review or a writ of error or method for the court, has the Senator reflected upon the propriety or expediency of providing that after the Interstate Commerce Commission has heard the whole case, it might be taken, within thirty days or sixty days while the order is not yet in execution, to a court by a writ of certiorari, where then the court would have before it the whole evidence in the case before it acted?

I should like to ask, if the Senator has fully investigated that matter, whether he does not think that perhaps a writ of certiorari might be the most convenient and also the most expeditious method of getting a conclusion of the controversy?

Mr. BAILEY. As a matter of convenience, I think the Senator is correct, but I think there is a very serious question as to the right of a court to issue a writ of certiorari to a body like this Commission.

Mr. RAYNER. I will take the liberty of interrupting the Senator from Texas to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. DANIEL. I will say to the Senator from Texas that he will find abundant precedents for the use of the writ of certiorari in writs of review, both for bodies which are entirely juridical and for those which are, to use the expression of the writers, quasi juridical, or have to exercise powers juridical in their nature. It has been done in a great many cases and seems to supply the very order of procedure which might be best employed here. I will state to the Senator, as we are trying to arrive at the best result in this matter through our colloquies, that I think he will discover that the precedents are sufficient in that regard.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to suggest——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that the Supreme Court has said that you can not certiorari from a judicial tribunal to an administrative body. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] gave the case the other day, and I gave two cases with which I suppose the Senator from Texas is familiar. You can not get a writ of certiorari from a judicial tribunal to an administrative body.

Mr. DANIEL. It may be you can not now, but it does not follow that Congress may not create power by which it may be done. All that any person is entitled to is to a full remedy and the right to be heard, and the process by which that remedy may be issued is due process of law if Congress provides it without impinging upon the rights of anybody to a full and fair hearing.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble about that is this: We confer upon this board a mere administrative power, in my opinion, and the writ of certiorari is intended to review an exercise of judicial power. I speak of the Commission as a board, and I provide that the individual can resort to the courts as well as the railroad; I also use the word "corporation" there to include municipal corporations. But whoever takes the matter into court does so by alleging that the board has transcended its power, and thus presents a judicial question.

I know that if there should be absolutely no word or line in this bill about going to the court, you could not keep the railroads out of the court, because they would simply refuse to obey the order, and then when you indicted the officials or sought a mandamus against the road or sought to recover a penalty and brought them into court, they would plead that your law was unconstitutional. You could not deprive them of that right, because if you once take them into court, they could have that question tried, and if you did not take them into court, they would simply disregard your law. The only process, in my judgment, just alike to the road and just alike to the people, is the one—I say it with all deference—which I have proposed.

But now, Mr. President, a word, and a word only, as between the just compensation I suggest and the language of the Hepburn bill——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Texas before he concludes, and if he prefers I will wait until he has concluded.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator may proceed now.

Mr. PATTERSON. What I wish to call the attention of the Senator to is the trouble or troubles that Senators upon both sides have discovered in this attempted legislation: First, the extent to which a review will be allowed by a court. Next, as to whether or not there shall be interlocutory orders staying the operation of the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission before the final determination by the court; and, in connection with that, the matter of delays that seem inseparable from court proceedings.

Now, why might not the matter be solved by transforming the Interstate Commerce Commission into an interstate-commerce court, eliminating the Commission, establishing a special court, as has been done in a great number of instances by Congress under the constitutional provision, and in the act constituting the interstate-commerce court, embrace practically every one of the provisions found in the interstate-commerce act and amendments thereto? Pretty nearly all the powers that are conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission may be said to be judicial powers. The Commission exists for the purpose of making investigations, for the purpose of determining questions of fact, to listen to the complaints of those who are injured in dealing with the railroad companies, and then to provide relief for the injured parties.

If we have the interstate-commerce court, there will be no room for interlocutory orders. If there is an appeal, then there will be nothing but an appeal; there will not be any original proceeding. As the matter stands in the proposed act, in whatever form it may ultimately pass, when the side to a controversy that has the complaint to make enters the court the trial is de novo. It must be as though there had been no money expended by litigants upon either side before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The witnesses must be again subpœnaed, the books must be again examined, the lawyers must again be heard; and it is only after the long and the tedious trial which must be had when you first get into a court that there is room or standing for an appeal.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission can be transposed into a court, then there is no need nor is there room for an interlocutory order, for, of course, the rate must stand as it stood when you appear for the first time before the Interstate Commerce Commission, until there shall be an adjudication of the question that is presented by the aggrieved shipper or by whomsoever else may desire to enter a court. Then comes an appeal, an appeal under proper limitations, an appeal in which there will be no room for the interposition of an injunctive order. The appeal comes upon the record, and there is not even the necessity or the opportunity for a second trial.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if this is within the bounds of possibility it should be the remedy, and it should afford a solution of the controversies and the grave troubles which are shown to exist by Senators upon either side of this question, all concurring that there are existing evils, that the evils must be remedied, and the only thing sought being a method of bringing relief to those who are suffering by reason of the evils. It does seem to me that the proposition is well worthy of consideration, and I can not see that there is any insuperable constitutional objection to the plan that I tentatively suggest.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has just been in receipt of news of the death of his father, which of course caused him to withdraw from the debate at this time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, unless there is some one else who wishes to take the floor I want this morning merely to submit an inquiry to the minds of Senators as to whether or not the services of a public carrier necessarily in all cases constitutes that class of property which can not be taken under the fifth amendment to the Constitution. The services of an individual constitute private property. It is a question in my mind as to whether the services of a common carrier which operates under a franchise that is an implied contract to remain always subject to the regulation of the creator comes within the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution to the same extent as the services of an individual. That is an inquiry which has been in my mind ever since this debate commenced, and I have been seeking for light upon it. I merely commend it to Senators for their legal considerations, because——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I anticipate the Senator intends discussing that question. The great majority of all discussion grows out of a misunderstanding of the subject of difference which is being discussed. I should like to ask the Senator whether his proposition involves taking below the limit of a reasonable rate? Does he claim that below that rate it can be taken, or whether down to that rate there is an implied obligation on the carrier to carry at that rate, and consequently it can not be taken?

Mr. HEYBURN. My inquiry goes further than that. My mind is not troubled in drawing the line as to the profitable or unprofitable service of the carrier. I am not troubled about that.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not speaking of what is profitable or unprofitable. The courts say that carriers take their charters subject to the implied obligation to carry at a reasonable rate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, it is the right of the shipper to have freight carried at that rate; and what I should like to ask the Senator is where he suggests that it is not properly within the protecting clause of the Constitution, whether he means below that rate it can be taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will, for the purpose of submitting this subject of inquiry, accept it upon the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota as to whether, under the implied contract of the charter under which a man enters upon the duties of a common carrier, with the privileges that go with it, he is not subject to the control of the Government that creates him a common carrier, even to the extent of being put out of business, so far as his right to claim immunity from attack under the fifth amendment to the Constitution is concerned. He enters into a contract that he will do business with the public as long as the public will agree with him as to the terms upon which the business shall be transacted. But it is a question as to whether or not he obtains a charter unrepealable at the hands of the public to do business with them upon some terms within the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which says that private property shall not be taken for public purposes without just compensation. Of course the basis upon which all the arguments have rested is that he was entitled to continue in business, and he was entitled to be protected in continuing in business to the extent of making a profit.

Now, there is a question in my mind, and a very serious question, as to whether or not that is true. If it is not true, then all of this argument as to our power falls to the ground; it is just that much waste time; it is an academic discussion of the question. If that is not the class of property that is protected by the fifth amendment, then all of this argument as to whether or not we can keep the common carrier out of court or can compel him to go into court falls to the ground, because the right to appeal to the courts is based upon the charge that a constitutional right is being taken away from a common carrier. If the right to charge for his services so as to yield a certain profit is not a constitutional right and the profits for such services are intangible property, then there is nothing in the argument.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to suggest to him that these franchises in nine cases out of ten, or probably in greater proportion, are not held under the Federal Government?

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon; my attention was distracted, and I did not just catch his question.

Mr. BACON. I venture to suggest to the Senator that in the application of the principle which he invokes, even if it is a correct one, there lies the fact that in nine cases out of ten the charters of the corporations, the rates of which this bill seeks to regulate, are under State authority and not under Federal authority; in other words, the authority which seeks to regulate is not the authority which has granted the franchise.

Mr. HEYBURN. My answer to that is that the State can not grant any charter that gives any charter party a right to do an interstate business except subject to revision by the Congress of the United States. Of course I am speaking only as to interstate commerce. States may create a public servant, a common carrier, but if he does more than local State business Congress can compel him as absolutely as though he were created by Congress.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, nobody disputes that proposition, but here is the point: As I understood the suggestion of the Senator, it is that corporations, holding their franchises as they do at the will of the sovereign, it is within the power of the sovereign which granted that franchise to limit or curtail or infringe upon it. I was simply taking the liberty of suggesting to the Senator, that being the principle, that the sovereign in the two cases is not the same. The sovereign which granted the charter is one, and the sovereign having, as it does undoubtedly, jurisdiction over interstate commerce, but having none over the franchise in this case, is the Federal sovereign and not the State sovereign.

Mr. HEYBURN. But still the sovereignty of the State that created the corporation or the carrier for local uses ceases at the State line, and by the courtesy of the Government is allowed to go into other States, or rather through States, to do business, and is subject to our control.

I would not maintain for a moment that any tangible property of a corporation or common carrier could be taken against the prohibition of the fifth amendment; but the question is whether or not a profit on the services, the performance of which are in a large measure optional at the hands of the common carrier, are that kind of property.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me again to interrupt him, if I do not obtrude——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. BACON. I understand the suggestion of the Senator to be that the right of a railroad chartered in one State to go into another State depends upon the authority given by the United States Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it depends upon the authority given by the other State.

Mr. BACON. Of course; but I understood the Senator to state it the other way. I was about to refer him to the case——

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I will make myself plain in a moment.

Mr. BACON. In the case in 13 Peters of Earle v. The Bank of Augusta, the Senator will find that the Supreme Court lays down the doctrine very fully.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have that in mind. I will state what I intended to say. I perhaps expressed myself inadequately. The privilege of doing business in a State other than that of the creator is a matter of grace on the part of that State. Yet under the provision of the Constitution that we are considering Congress has power over interstate commerce. It does not matter who creates the agency, whether it is the corporation or whether it is an individual, the control of interstate commerce is given to Congress by the Constitution; and so the question as to whether the corporation is the creature of one State or another becomes of minor importance. But the question is as to the character of property that is proposed to be taken as to whether it is that class of property which is protected by the fifth amendment. That is what I have in my mind.

As I was proceeding to say, of course we could not take any tangible property from such a corporation, because it bears an entirely different relation to that class of property which is recognized as property in the hands of any person, artificial or natural. The services of an individual are the individual property, held by the grace of nobody but himself; but the services of a public carrier belong to the public, subject to regulation by the public. The framers of the Constitution had that in mind when they gave Congress the power to control the performance of interstate commerce and duties of that character.

Now, if the suggestion has merit that profits on the services of a public carrier are not such property, then this discussion could be curtailed to the extent of eliminating all question of the power of the Congress to control this matter without giving the right of appeal to the courts, because it is only upon that ground, and that alone, that we are laboring with this question.

The suggestion is one that has been growing up out of the discussion of this case. I have no doubt that a careful examination of the decisions of the court would disclose a line of demarcation between the class of property as represented by personal services at the hands of the individual as distinguished from profits at the hands of the public carrier. It is one of those conclusions that are obvious. Here is a creature that owes a duty to the public, that is performing it by the grace of the public statute, and that is made subject to the control of the law. The Constitution did not undertake to say that Congress could regulate the services of an individual as to whether he operated in one place or another, but only the public carrier, who owes a duty to the public, who derives a benefit by reason of being a common carrier.

The obvious conclusion is that if he does not like the restrictions which the people, speaking through their statutes, place upon his business he can go out of business. He still has his property. We have not taken his property. He can sell it to some other person who is willing to go into business. We leave him with his property and his right to enjoy it, provided that he will enjoy it within the will of the people.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question? Would not the person to whom this property is sold find himself subjected to the same public authority, and would he not be in the same difficulty? Is it not true that the value of a railroad is in its use? It might be sold, it is true, and the person who buys it must use it, and if he uses it under the restrictions and limitations suggested the property is of no value to him or to another corporation, because it could only be sold for use. The rails can not be taken up. The land taken for this use is not valuable for any other purpose of the corporation. So it seems to me that after all it must be very clear that compensation for the use of the railroad must be regarded as property, under the Constitution. I should think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that is true, and I would distinguish between the term "use" and the wage which the railroad earns.

The Senator has to some extent taken a rather different position from that which I understood his colleague [Mr. DOLLIVER] to take, that this is a duty to be performed for a compensation. Based upon what? The value of the property or the value of the service? Much of the argument here on this question has been to the effect that the compensation was to be based upon the value of the property. I say the compensation should be based upon the value of services, and so does the Senator. I would agree heartily with a measure that would recognize that principle.

Mr. ALLISON. But I think that is rather a fine distinction. The value of the property depends upon the value of the service rendered or that can be rendered. If there were only one train of cars running from New York to Chicago on a four-track railway, the railway itself would be of very little value. But if there were a thousand cars running daily and the four tracks were in use, then the property would be valuable, and it would be compensation derived from that use which would make it valuable. I do not quite see the distinction.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I can make that distinction plain to the Senator from Iowa. The distinction between the value of the service and the value of the property can be illustrated in this way. Of course, always when I speak of the value of the property I mean the claimed value of it, not the real value.

I will take a railroad that is overcapitalized, or that is extravagantly constructed, or that has incurred an indebtedness which was not warranted by law. The owners of the road will estimate the value of that property to be what it cost them. But it may have cost them four times as much as it should have cost them. Now, the value of the service is the cost of transporting a ton of commodity a given number of miles. It is represented by the cost of the structure of the road—that is, the honest cost of it—by the cost of the equipment of the road, and by the cost of the service—what you might call the labor—the expenditure required to operate the trains.

That is the cost of carrying a ton of freight; but if you base it upon the value of the property and allow the railroad company themselves to fix the value, it is a very different proposition. That question has got to enter into the consideration of every proposition which is submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill. The Commission can not determine what is a fair and reasonable charge without, as a basis of their determination, ascertaining the cost. I do not mean the extravagant charges that are made against the corporation, but the real value of the investment. They have got to ascertain it in order, first, to determine how much would be a just compensation for the use of the money represented by the investment; and it is going to be quite an undertaking for them as to certain railroad companies I have in mind to ascertain what is the real investment.

Now, Mr. President, you have got to face the question as to whether these charges are to be based upon the cost of the service or whether they are to be based upon the claimed or real value of the property. It is a divisible question as to who shall ascertain and upon what basis shall be ascertained the value of the property. The Interstate Commerce Commission have got to fight that question out with the railroad companies, and then the courts will have to define the rights of the investors, the producers, shippers, and the railroad companies. We are laying out a big work for the Commission here, and we will need men of pretty large caliber to perform the duties that are to be vested in them under this measure should it be enacted into a law, because, in the first place, they have got to determine and establish some basis upon which to fix charges that shall be fair and reasonable, for the reason that the courts have never laid down a satisfactory rule. Take a railroad I have in my mind. It picked up $90,000,000 of bonded indebtedness of another railroad combination under the plea that they were going to retire these bonds, and incurred $90,000,000 indebtedness against their own line for the purpose of raising the money. They never retired the bonds of the road they purchased, and to-day there is on the market $180,000,000 of bonds representing $90,000,000 indebtedness, which you can readily understand. That is a transaction which passed between two of our leading railroad systems not very long since.

Now, what will the Interstate Commerce Commission do with that? In estimating what is a fair and reasonable charge will they consider that this road has cost $180,000,000 or will they say that the road is worth $80,000,000 or whatever it could be constructed for? Will they take that as a basis upon which to estimate profits or will they say, "We will not go beyond the record and inquire as to the indebtedness of the road on the face of its balance sheet?"

I think we will eventually have to come back to the proposition of considering the cost of transporting the passenger or the ton of freight. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] this morning said that would be a work of infinite detail and that it would perhaps be impossible. Well, it has been done in Germany, it has been done in France, it has been done in some of the States of this Union. Iowa did it. Iowa has a complete schedule of charges that were made up by a committee of the legislature or its instrument, fixing the charges in detail to every part of the State of Iowa and over every road in it. Of course it was a work of infinite detail; but it can be accomplished. I would not like to admit that the Interstate Commerce Commission can perform a public duty that the Senate is not capable of performing through its methods of doing business. It may be that we will have to go more into detail in regard to the establishment of rules by which our Commission shall be governed in determining this question.

But I did not rise to discuss that question at this time. I merely wanted to project the inquiry into the legal minds of the Senate as to whether or not the profits of a common carrier was a class of property that came within the prohibition of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. I am inclined to think it is not, because it is a class of property that may be either extended or withheld. It is entirely within the power of the common carrier, represented by the individual control that operates it, to withdraw from business. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says some one else would have to do it. That is very true. I know of an instance, very familiar to the Senate, where a railroad corporation that was not able to earn 1 per cent upon its fixed charges, including indebtedness, squeezed out $265,000,000 of its consolidated mortgage indebtedness and picked its property up on a basis of its real value and is paying dividends, and has never missed one since.

It may be, if Congress will so legislate, that these common carriers will be compelled to present an honest front to the public who patronize them; that they, too, will find a remedy, either through the hands of those who operate them now or through the means of wiser hands that will pick up the responsibility when they have failed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that if he will address himself to providing some remedy for this overcapitalization in the way of an amendment I, at least, will be very friendly toward it, and if it will accomplish its purpose, I certainly will vote for it. So I hope he will think it over seriously and give us the benefit of his study and investigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress and at the beginning of this Congress I introduced a measure that was calculated and that, in my judgment, is sufficient to meet the necessities of this occasion. It is doubtless receiving the careful consideration of the committee upon whose table it is now reposing.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would prefer the Senator not to dodge or to get around the question I put to him, or the request I made, by referring to something that he did last year or when Congress met; but, as we are legislating or attempting to legislate, having a bill here, let him prepare an amendment that will remedy the trouble which he sees and which everyone recognizes. I certainly will give it most careful consideration, and I am sure the Senate will; and if it will accomplish the purpose, I certainly will vote for it. But do not say that there is something somewhere, and that a committee of which I am a member is considering it. We have had a great many things to consider. It took us three months to get this bill before the Senate without an amendment on it. So I am afraid if you refer this idea of an amendment to remedy this trouble back to the Committee on Interstate Commerce we will never hear anything more from that committee. It has got to come into the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I realize that it may be possible that the discussion of this question at this time might awaken some new train of thought in the minds of Senators which would prolong this discussion, but it seems to me that it is germane to the consideration of the whole question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say it is entirely germane, and I hope the Senator will not confine his discussion to an academic treatment of it, but will give us a concrete proposition in the shape of an amendment, so that we can vote on it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have an amendment on my desk, and I may have others subsequently, but this debate has not really proceeded to that point where it seems to me profitable to undertake the injection of that kind of amendment. It has been more of a general discussion by each member, sometimes with interruptions, but, as a rule, it has been what we might call—without any disrespect to those who have addressed the Senate on the subject—a set of formal addresses. In the period of general debate, if this bill shall reach that period, and I hope it will, when Senators will take an interest in and quick notice and apprehension of the views of each other—when that period comes, I think there will probably be a good many amendments suggested to this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no doubt about that; but unless the Senator will give us the benefit of his studies in the shape of an amendment which we can examine and debate when the time comes for this quick interchange of thought and action by voting, I am afraid that some of the valuable suggestions which he is making will be lost; and as we are discussing this very question of the justice or injustice, the reasonableness or the unreasonableness of rates—and I agree with the Senator that the question of capitalization or overcapitalization is one of the essential factors in that matter—I hope he will not back water, but that he will get ready to present his ideas in the shape of amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think there is any question closer to my consideration of the bill of which the Senator from South Carolina has charge than that which I expressed when I first addressed the Senate to-day—that is, whether or not the services of a public carrier are the class of property contemplated by the fifth amendment of the Constitution. That is a question we have to decide in order to intelligently dispose of this bill.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. PETTUS. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. I desire to ask him if the Commission were converted into a court, would there not be much more difficulty in delegating to a court the powers that this Commission now have than there would be in delegating them to a board without judicial power?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a question evenly balanced. We can not delegate to a judicial tribunal administrative powers, nor can we delegate to an administrative tribunal judicial powers, except within the limitations of the Constitution.

Mr. PETTUS. Has such a thing ever been authorized?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I think that is a matter for the legislative branch of the Government to dispose of. The Constitution says we may create other courts than those mentioned in the Constitution and confer such jurisdiction upon them as we see fit, within the general limitations of the Constitution.

Mr. PETTUS. How will the Senator get rid of that clause in the Constitution which says that one of these departments of the Government can not exercise the powers of another?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not infringe on it. That is the easiest way to avoid the difficulty; but we can create minor courts, or other courts. We created the circuit courts and the district courts; we created all the United States courts, except the Supreme Court of the United States. The Constitution created that, but gave to Congress the power to create the other courts. The Constitution also says that we may confer such jurisdiction upon them as we see fit within the limitations, of course, of the general provisions of the Constitution, which define where judicial power shall rest and to what extent it may be extended.

There is much merit in the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] on that question of substituting a transportation court, or a court for transportation, for an interstate-commerce bureau or commission. In England, I believe, the court is denominated a transportation court, or a court of transportation; but, of course, England has not a constitution that delineates and defines the boundaries between concurrent jurisdictions. There the jurisdiction is all from the Crown.

But, Mr. President, I should like the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to understand, if I am correct, that the question which I have submitted, as to whether or not there is any constitutional prohibition or limitation upon us here, exists. That question exists; and it is before us, and we have got to take notice of it in determining this matter. It is not an academic question as applied to the measure under consideration at all; but it is a live question; and it has got to be disposed of, and it will be disposed of, whether we take notice of its disposition or not. It will be wrapped up and involved in anything we do in this matter, to be unwrapped by the courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator mean capitalization?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I mean the question as to whether or not there is such a prohibition against our action as will affect the right of the railroads to hire themselves out to the public. Perhaps I have not succeeded in making myself plain enough for the Senator to comprehend just exactly what I mean; but that is the question that is behind every bit of discussion on the rate bill that has taken place here during the last week.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I understand the Senator at all, it is to the effect that the value of the service alone shall govern the compensation.

Mr. HEYBURN. That has nothing to do with the question of whether we can confiscate or take away the compensation for the services entirely, and, as I say, put the transportation companies out of business. They exist by our grace. I am not speaking of the justice of it. I have no sympathy with the confiscation of the property of anybody, whether it be individual or corporate, and I have no sympathy with those who inveigh against the railroads of the country. They have been the instruments of its civilization and its growth and progress; and to-day in the State that I represent we have, I believe, five separate railroad corporations of the country constructing railroads. We have no desire to array ourselves as the opponents or enemies of railroads, whether operating, constructed, or under construction; but I am speaking now of a principle of law involved in this legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator kindly repeat it?

Mr. HEYBURN. The principle involved in this legislation is as to whether or not we are under any obligation to take notice of or anticipate the question of confiscation in dealing with rates—not what we may do in regulating freight rates. The Commission and the courts will deal with those questions in executing and applying the law. I am inclined to believe that it does not necessarily enter into the consideration of this question by us at all, and that we should not be violating the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States in dealing with this question, even though we might pass beyond that into the realm of confiscation of profits dependent on economical management.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator think Congress would have the power to compel public carriers to transport persons and freight at a loss?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; you can not compel them to do that any more than they could compel you—I speak of Congress—to do it. We can not compel a man to work for us since the abolition of slavery in this country; but if we do accept his services, if he is a private individual, we do it by contract, and if he is a public servant it is because the law imposes a liability or duty upon him to do it. That is the difference.

There are two classes of services. A railroad company can be compelled to operate its trains so long as it holds itself out as a public carrier; but a railroad company can go out of business like anybody else. I saw 60 or 70 miles of track taken up by a railroad built into a country where it proved to be unprofitable; and it went out of business. In the case which went to the Supreme Court from the State of Washington, involving the question as to whether or not the inhabitants of a certain section of the Spokane suburbs could compel a railroad to operate its line, the question was thoroughly passed upon, and I do not know but the Senator from Washington may have had something to do with it. At least he is familiar with it. We know very well where the line is drawn; but there is nothing we can do to compel a public carrier to continue in business. It may sell its property to a successor, and the successor would take its place—that is all right—and take the belongings and conduct the business in the best way it could to meet the views of the public and perform the service within the limits of a fair and reasonable compensation.

I would not be understood as attacking public carriers or railroad corporations or transportation companies of any kind. My sympathies are with them. I believe in such legislation as will encourage that kind of enterprise; but I do not believe in turning the country over to them without that control necessary to compel them to deliver valuable services for the benefits that they derive from the public. My suggestion in regard to overcapitalization was merely incidental to that question.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. PILES. I do not know that I quite understand the Senator's position; but I understand him to contend that it is within the power of Congress to fix such a rate as will compel a railroad company to operate its trains, if it operates them at all, at a loss. Is that the question at issue to which the Senator refers?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think that correctly states my views. I did not intend so to express them. I intended to say that we were not compelled to take into consideration the question of the profit or loss of operating a railroad regardless of the manner of operation of such road; that we were not to guarantee profits to a reckless and wasteful management, but if we enacted a law here that resulted in a burden upon transportation companies, so long as that law existed they could either conform to it or go out of business. But I would not vote for any measure here that, in my judgment, would operate to compel a public carrier or transportation company to perform services without an adequate compensation—not for a moment would I give my support to such a measure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the doctrine for which he contends was, as I understand, the doctrine that was declared in the case of Munn against Illinois. There the question was as to the right of the legislature to fix elevator charges, I believe. The Supreme Court laid down the rule that, wherever a person employed his property in a use in which the public had an interest, he granted the public an interest in the use, and must submit to regulation by the public. My recollection is that the Chief Justice in that case stated it was no objection to the doctrine that the regulation might result even in a deprivation of compensation, that the remedy of the party regulated was to abandon the use; but that so long as the use itself was maintained, the regulation would be maintained. That doctrine was subsequently very much modified, until recently, in the case of Ames against Smith, the court laid down the doctrine that, in fixing rates, regard must be had for a fair return on the value of the property; and that in determining that value the original cost, the cost of reproduction, the issues of stocks and bonds, etc., should be considered.

I think, if the Senator will look over the authorities, he will find that there has since been a gradual advance made by the Supreme Court to this position, which gives to the common carriers owning property affected by a public use the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution; a protection which was absolutely denied, according to my recollection, in the case of Munn against Illinois. As I remember, in that case the Chief Justice asserted that if there was legislation which accomplished an injustice upon a party who dedicated his property to the public use, the only remedy was at the polls. That would certainly be an impossible remedy in the case of common carriers and corporations engaged in the public service, for it is certainly impossible for them to carry any proposition at the polls, except perhaps by indirection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, Mr. President, the Granger cases went to the extreme, and the pendulum swung too far back. The cases to which the Senator from Nevada refers involve the question, not of what the legislature could do, but what it should do. If a person accepts the services of a public carrier, he must make a fair return for prudent, honest, and economical service. In the cases referred to the services had been performed, and it was a question of a fair return for those services. But I was dealing with the question from the standpoint that the services were not yet performed and that the option was open. I merely wanted to suggest the inquiry because it will have to be taken into account.

The other questions, when they may properly be brought before the Senate, I shall take pleasure in discussing, as the Senator from South Carolina suggests, at more length and with more particularity, because I am strongly in sympathy with a provision, either in this bill or another, that will prevent a common carrier from demanding of the public compensation upon fictitious values.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will get it ready for this bill; I am afraid we will never get another.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I think the elements of it are in this bill, and it only needs elaborating a little. The House bill requires that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall inquire into values, and I think perhaps that that section of the bill—I do not recall the number of the section—particularized and elaborated a little might probably authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to require such a statement; and upon that statement make such investigation as would determine the bona fides of the fixed charges that were the basis of the demand of the railroad or the transportation company for compensation. I think that might be done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Several Senators have notified me of their desire to speak on this bill. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will speak to-morrow, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was to have spoken to-day, but something has prevented him from coming here; I think he is ill perhaps. I therefore ask that the bill may be laid aside for the day, without losing its place as the unfinished business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 21, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplin, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Oh, Thou great Spirit, who hast been the inspiration of men to high and noble achievement, help us to realize that it is not what we get out of the world but what we put into the world that counts for righteousness. Inspire us, therefore, with high conceptions of right and duty, and help us to noble endeavors that we may leave the world a little better than we found it. Profoundly impressed by the sudden and unexpected death of one of the Members of this House, we are warned that we must work while it is yet day, for the night cometh when no man can work. God be with the bereaved family; give them that hope and confidence in Thee which will inspire them with lofty thoughts and bring them closer to Thee, and finally to that happy reunion beyond this land, where no death enters. Hear us in the name of Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

M. E. THOMAS.

R. 51 from the appropriation for the expenses of special and select committees of the contingent fund of the Senate.

ENGAGEMENT AT MOUNT DAJO, ISLAND OF JOLO.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer a Senate resolution, but before doing so I ask the Senate to indulge me a moment in explanation of it.

A few days ago the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to send to the Senate copies of all official reports and communications between the War Department and officials of the United States in the Philippines, respecting the recent attack by American troops on Mount Dajo. That report has been received. Apparently, though I am not sure about it, there are some omissions. For instance, on page 1 of the report the Secretary uses this language:

Following condensed from Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood.

Apparently indicating that the War Department has condensed the report from General Wood, whereas the resolution called for copies of all reports. So on page 3 of the report there is manifestly an omission from the report made by General Wood in answer to the Military Secretary, shown by stars in the published report we have received.

I therefore offer a resolution broader than the one adopted the other day directing the Secretary of War to send to the Senate full copies of all reports and all other communications which have passed to this date between the officials in the United States and any such officials in the Philippine Islands. The purpose of broadening the resolution is twofold: First, to secure full copies of the reports, which have been made here apparently in a condensed form, and, second, to secure copies of any communications which may have been made by the President of the United States with reference to this matter and subsequent reports which may have been submitted by General Wood. For instance, I noticed in the press a few days ago that General Wood has latterly denied that any women and children were killed, or has certainly denied that all of them were killed. I think it is important, in the interest of truth, if that should be the fact, that we shall have that information here.

My purpose in introducing the resolution is to get all the facts upon this subject within the control of the Government of the United States, so that if the Senate desires to take any action with reference to this matter, it may be done upon full information so far as we have it to this date. I therefore offer the resolution I send to the desk and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to send to the Senate full copies of all reports and all other communications which have passed to this date between the officials of the United States in the United States and any such officials in the Philippine Islands respecting the recent attack by troops of the United States on Mount Dajo.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution will lie over until to-morrow.

PROPOSED ISLE OF PINES INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, and in connection with it and in support of it three affidavits, and also an extract from the Daily Telegraph, published in Habana, Cuba, March 13, 1906. I ask that the resolution be read and that the affidavits and this extract be printed in connection with it and go over for consideration until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Chair, with instructions to make diligent and careful examination into the condition of the people of the Isle of Pines before and since the enactment of the law known as the "Platt amendment" to the Army appropriation bill, approved the 2d day of March, 1901, and up to the time of the execution of this order and their report thereon.

Such inquiry shall include the form of the so-called "government de facto" in said island, its officers, and by whom appointed, and the manner in which such government has been conducted by those who claim or have claimed to be in authority there since the Army of the United States was withdrawn from the Island of Cuba and the government of that island was turned over to the Congress and people of Cuba.

The committee shall inquire and report whether under such government in the Isle of Pines any official abuses or oppressions have occurred with reference to the people of that island affecting their liberties, their persons, or their schools, their churches, their sepultures, their taxation, their employment or vocation, their property of any description, the registry of their land titles or wills or other conveyancies, their intercourse and trade on the island, or with other ports or places, or with shipping engaged in the trade of the island.

They will inquire and report in respect of any alleged judicial proceedings, civil or criminal, conducted or entertained by any judge, magistrate, or alcalde acting under the laws of Cuba, against any of the inhabitants of the Isle of Pines, resulting in their imprisonment or amercement in fines or forfeitures, and of the places at which such trials were had, and as to the removal of such defendants, by force or compulsion, to any place in the island of Cuba to answer such accusations or prosecutions. And also whether the alleged judicial officers so employed in such proceedings were appointed by the Government of Cuba or of any department thereof.

Said committee will further inquire and report as to the number of American citizens that were residing in the Isle of Pines at the time when the Government of Cuba was turned over to the Congress and people of the Republic of Cuba and before that time, and when the immigration of such citizens into said island first begun.

They will further ascertain and report as to the progress of such immigration, and the classes of people who settled in the island as seekers and builders of permanent homes or places of residence, and the number of such citizens who now reside in the Isle of Pines as permanent settlers; and also what increase or decrease of population and of what citizenship, respectively, has taken place in that island since the evacuation of Cuba by the Army of the United States.

The committee will also examine into the condition of the island as to agriculture, fruit growing, and the extent to which the immigrants from the United States are landowners and cultivators, and whether their crops, orchards, and farm productions, such as cattle, hogs, and poultry, are becoming productive and prosperous.

They will also give descriptions of the topography of the island, its waters and water courses, and its coasts, bays, inlets, and harbors, with reference to navigation; and its roads and bridges and by whom constructed and paid for; its forests and their value; the healthfulness of the island, and the character and conduct of the citizens of the United States who reside there, and, generally, any facts that will inform the Senate as to all material facts concerning the duty of the Government toward the safeguarding, protection, and regulation and control of its citizens who inhabit the Isle of Pines.

2. Said committee is empowered to visit the Isle of Pines, or to designate a subcommittee to visit the same, and to send for persons and papers. Oaths to witnesses may be administered by any member of the committee or subcommittee.

3. The committee is empowered to appoint a secretary, a stenographer, a typewriter, and a sergeant-at-arms, and to pay them their compensation at the rate prescribed by law.

The necessary allowances for travel and board of the committee and its officers and for attendance and the mileage and attendance of witnesses shall be paid on proper vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The committee may sit during the sessions of the Senate or during its vacations and at any place in the United States or in the Isle of Pines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie over.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that it be printed and go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That was the request the Senator from Alabama made. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Alabama to request that the affidavits accompanying the resolution should be printed as a document?

Mr. MORGAN. Printed as a part of and in support of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As a public document?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care about its being a document for general circulation. I want it for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. That will be a public document.

Mr. MORGAN. That will be a public document, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. And in connection with it an extract from the Daily Telegraph of Tuesday, March 13, 1906, published at Habana.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not hear what the Senator from Alabama said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama requests that there be printed in connection with the resolution an article appearing in the Daily Telegraph of Tuesday, March 13, 1906, published at Habana, Cuba.

Mr. FORAKER. I request that there be published in connection with the resolution an article which appeared in the New York Sun Monday, March 5, 1906, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio desire that the article he has just sent to the desk be printed in connection with the public document ordered to be printed at the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. Immediately following the article that is to be published at the request of the Senator from Alabama. If newspaper articles are to cut any figure in this matter, we can fill the RECORD full of them. This is only a specimen of a hundred I could send to the desk.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator, who is probably opposed to the resolution, when it comes up could either undertake to meet it by offering testimony in contradiction of it or in support of his position. But the Senator can have his sweet way about it. I have no objection.

I will offer in this same connection a letter from Mr. Fries, a very distinguished attorney of Cincinnati, and ask that it be also printed in connection with the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. That is a letter from Mr. Fries. Has the Senator one from the chief justice of the Republic of the Isle of Pines, who also resides at Cincinnati when he is at his home?

Mr. MORGAN. We will not discuss letters here this morning, if the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. FORAKER. I shall be very glad to discuss them this morning or at any other time. I sent the newspaper article to the desk only to illustrate in a practical way that what appears in one newspaper may be easily offset by what appears in another newspaper. I apprehend that when we determine this very important matter it will not be determined upon what somebody has seen fit to cause to be published in newspapers, but upon information that we obtain in a proper way and which we know is reliable. Every day there is something appearing in the newspapers that might be quoted first on one side and then on the other. My only purpose was to show that there are two sides in the newspapers to this controversy.

Mr. MORGAN. I offered what I have sent to the desk—the three affidavits and the newspaper extract—for the purpose of supporting my resolution. The Senator from Ohio has seen proper to offer something that I suppose he thinks is against the resolution. It is a very unusual proceeding, sir. I merely ask that the papers be printed in connection with the resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. And I merely ask that my newspaper article be printed along with the rest of them.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all right. I consent to that, and anything else the Senator wants to put in.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUEVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES, W. I.,
March 1, 1906.

Maj. J. E. RUNCIE,
Habana 58, Habana, Cuba.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned committee, were appointed at a mass meeting of the American residents of the island to confer with you in regard to the case of A. E. Moerke, of Columbia, Isle of Pines. We inclose herewith his letter to the American minister, dated February 22, which was sent to him by the boat on that date, and as yet he is without an answer. The authorities here have been feeling around offering some sort of a compromise to Moerke, but he prefers to take his medicine until the minister replies to his request for a release.

At the mass meeting held here to-day many thought it best to seek his release, hence this committee was appointed to confer with legal advice and be guided by that advice. This committee has procured all the additional facts possible, and submit them below:

On Wednesday morning, February 21, five rural guards came to Mr. Moerke's place of business and demanded $100 cash bond, or they would arrest him and take him to Nueva Gerona. Mr. Moerke refused to put up the cash bond, and also explained to the guard that this being mail day that his duties as postmaster required him to be on hand upon the arrival of the boat and transport the mail from the dock to the post-office at Columbia, of which he is postmaster. Thereupon they arrested him, but promised to let him return in time to permit him to attend to the mail. After arrival at Nueva Gerona, instead of taking him before the judge, he was taken to the Cuban jail under the pretense of reporting to the captain of the guard, and he was thereupon locked up, and was not taken before the judge until 2 o'clock p. m. of same day. The first and only question asked him by the judge was: "Do you recognize my authority as judge of the Isle of Pines?" To which Mr. Moerke replied: "Under the circumstances and the present status of the Isle of Pines, I do not consider that you have any legal authority on this island." Whereupon the judge became furious, and stated that he would fine him $100 and fifty days in jail; that he would teach the Americans to acknowledge his authority; but after cooling down somewhat he changed the fine to $50 cash or fifty days in jail, and asked Mr. Moerke which he would accept. Mr. Moerke replied that he would not pay the fine, and at the judge's order he was incarcerated in the Cuban prison. During all of these proceedings nothing was said to him to indicate why he had been arrested or why he was fined for contempt of court other than for the language above quoted.

The second day after his incarceration six rural guards, by order of the judge, went to Mr. Moerke's place of business at Columbia, and, as Mrs. Moerke was there alone, she refused them admittance. The neighbors came to see what was being done and witnessed the guards with guns cocked force themselves into the store department of the building, and removed all merchandise therefrom, and not being satisfied with the amount found therein, demanded entrance into the living departments of the same building, which was refused by Mrs. Moerke, she stating to the guards that the door she was guarding was the door to the post-office, through which they had to pass to reach their living rooms. In spite of refusal and information, they persisted, with their weapons again cocked, forced their way into the post-office and living rooms, carrying off, among other effects, a sewing machine, being the personal property of Mrs. Moerke, notwithstanding the fact that they were shown the evidence that same was her property. This seizure was made without due process of law and while Mr. Moerke was illegally detained in jail.

Mr. Moerke telegraphed to the Postmaster-General that he was prevented from his official duties as postmaster and referred the Postmaster-General to the Postal Code, article No. 31, requesting him to advise, since which he has nothing from him. These are the facts presented for your consideration and advice as to what procedure is necessary to bring about the best results for the cause for which we are all working, Mr. Moerke being willing to do whatever is necessary.

Yours, respectfully,

JAS. M. STEERE,
CHARLES REYNARD,
R. P. EWING,
Committee.

The above letter, written by a committee, of which I was chairman, appointed to investigate the arrest and imprisonment of Postmaster Moerke, of the Columbia post-office, to Major Runsie, of Habana, for the purpose of obtaining legal advice upon the subject, contains the truth concerning all the circumstances as we ascertained them to be after an impartial investigation.

JAS. M. STEERE.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., ss:

Personally appeared before me, James M. Steere, of the Isle of Pines, who, first being duly sworn, deposes and says that the above letter and his statement following are true in all essential facts, according to the best of his personal knowledge and belief.

[SEAL.] BENJ. VAIL, Notary Public.

IN JAIL, NUEVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES, W. I.,
February 22, 1906.

Hon. Mr. MORGAN,
United States Minister to Cuba, Habana, Cuba.

DEAR SIR: As a law-abiding citizen of the United States I hereby appeal to you to take the necessary steps in my behalf in having me released from this Cuban prison. I was placed here by a Cuban judge under the charge of contempt of court, my sentence being a fine of $50 or fifty days in jail.

The facts which have led up to this state of affairs I will briefly state, as follows: I came here from the State of Iowa, and located at Columbia, Isle of Pines, upon the assurances of the War Department that this was and would remain American territory. Have opened a small store, selling a stock of general merchandise, and have paid the tax or license, which is very heavy, up to the 1st of last July, but when the Cuban Government added to my license 30 per cent for the purpose of paying off the bonds issued for the payment of their Cuban soldiers I refused to pay any part of same, as my understanding is that General Wood had a distinct understanding with the Cuban Government that the Isle of Pines would remain as a de facto government until the United States took charge of same. In fact, I maintain that under the Platt amendment and under the Cuban constitution they have no rights on this island. They have tried in many ways to make me pay what I firmly believe I have no right to pay and what I believe they have no right to make me pay.

My place of business is 6 or 7 miles from this place, and last Monday I was summoned to appear before the judge here. I came at the appointed hour and waited some time to see the judge, but could not get any satisfaction as to the time he would see me, and as I had important business to attend to at home, being the postmaster at that point for the Cuban Government, hence an officer of that Government, I could not wait longer, and went back to my home and business. The next morning the rural guards arrested me and brought me to this place and placed me in jail to await the pleasure of the judge. At 2 o'clock I was taken through the streets of this town to the court and was sentenced without a trial to a fine of $50 or fifty days in jail.

If you have ever visited a Cuban jail or even seen their "bill of fare," you will know what I am suffering, to say nothing of the humiliation of being obliged to submit to such punishment from such a source, especially when I know they have no rights that entitle them to inflict this punishment on an American citizen. Had I committed any criminal act there might be some excuse for my incarceration, but simply because I could not wait all day for his pleasure to see me he inflicts this unheard-of fine. Had he sent again for me and stated the time he would see me I would have accommodated him, even at considerable inconvenience to me. In fact, I have never been informed why I was summoned, and can only surmise it related to my nonpayment of their demand for license. They have never expended a centen for the benefit of this island, and many owners of vehicles are refusing to pay taxes on their vehicles until the Cuban Government does something for the betterment of the roads and bridges.

I trust that you will make or cause to be made an investigation of my case at your earliest possible moment, before any more of my fellow-citizens are subject to such outrageous treatment.

Yours, very respectfully,

A. E. MOERKE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22, 1906.

To the Senate of the United States:

Your petitioner, James M. Steere, formerly a citizen of Texas, living in what he believes to be American territory, is constrained to apply to your honorable body for such relief as may be in your power to grant. Your petitioner has lived with his family in the Isle of Pines, which he was led to regard as American territory through the representations made by officials of the War and other Departments of the United States Government for a period of the year passed. Prior to that time, although now 61 years of age, he has never been summoned to any court or been under arrest for any criminal act. He served honorably and with distinction as a Union soldier in the civil war. He was discharged in 1862 under a surgeon's certificate of disability, but was reenlisted in 1864 after partial recovery as regimental commissary sergeant on the understanding that his physical condition would permit him to do clerical work. He then served to the end of the civil war. He has been entitled to a pension for the past forty years, but never even made an application for the same, not wishing to become a pensioner as long as he was able to earn his own living.

Since the war time he has held many responsible and honorable positions, filling at one time or another the positions of secretary and treasurer of the Missouri Iron Works, of St. Louis; agent of the Canada Southern Fast Freight Line for nine consecutive years, and assistant general freight agent of the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railway, a part of the system of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, for eight years. During the time that he was assistant general freight agent, he was appointed assistant adjutant-general of the Department of Texas, Grand Army of the Republic. He was the general agent for the Kansas and Texas Coal Company for Texas and Mexico. He was president of the Republican League Club of Dallas, Tex., for several years, and was the representative of the Sixth Congressional district on the Republican State central committee of Texas for several years. He was induced to go to the Isle of Pines on account of his health, mainly through the alluring description of the island sent out under the auspices of the War Department and the letters of that and other Departments sent out to the effect that the Isle of Pines of right was and would be continued as American territory.

Notwithstanding his unblemished character and services and his eminently peaceful and quiet demeanor at all times, he has been forced to abandon his home and property in the Isle of Pines and flee to the United States to escape a Cuban prison for no offense that would be recognized in any civilized country as worthy of even a jail sentence of a few days in duration. He has dutifully complied with all reasonable orders of the Cuban courts, but is now unwilling to serve a term of from three to six years in a Cuban prison at his advanced time of life and in his present state of health on a charge of malversation of public property which he has turned over to the Isle of Pines court as ordered, and so far as he knows, is now in their possession. Such in the sentence he firmly and truly believes awaits him in Habana if he answers in person to the summons which he has received, and which he has been informed is simply the prologue to a severe penalty of imprisonment which has been determined on in advance of his trial. He truly believes that this persecution from the Cuban authorities is due mainly to his recent prominent part in the mass meetings of American citizens in the Isle of Pines held for the purpose of securing an American government in the island if possible. Following is a translation of the summons which warned him that he would have to flee the country or be imprisoned without cause:

"Señor JAMES A. STEERE (case No. 3906):

"By order of the judge you are cited to appear on the 28th of the present month before the second division of the first criminal court of the district of Havana, for the purpose of answering as defendant in open court in the case numbered on the margin, brought against you for the malversation of public property. You are advised to present yourself or give sufficient reason as to what prevents and show cause therefor.

"Nueva Gerona, March 6, 1906; given at 2 p. m.

"JOAQ. F. ALCAZAR, Clerk of the Court."

Statements which recently appeared in the Havana Telegraph of the date of March 13, a newspaper published in the city of Havana, were to the effect that the Cuban rural guard, in the Isle of Pines, had orders, seemingly from the Cuban secretary of state, to shoot down all Americans who offered the slightest resistance or provocation to the high-handed procedure of the Cuban authorities, or who should commit any act against Cuban sovereignty. On account of this and many other threats in La Lucha, another Cuban newspaper published in the same place, as well as on account of other statements by hot-headed Cubans, both in Cuba and on the Isle of Pines, many Americans are leaving the island, especially women and children, who are thus obliged to abandon their homes and their property.

A clear statement of the facts which lead up to the interference of the Habana courts in my case in the Isle of Pines may be had from the following letters written by me to Edward P. Ryan, at Washington, D. C., who was elected as a delegate to represent the Isle of Pines settlers at the capital of the United States:

NUEVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES,
January 20, 1906.

Mr. ED. P. RYAN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since writing you last I have had a little case of Cuban justice, which I will truthfully explain below. The Palace Hotel, as you are aware, got into financial difficulty, and its creditors had to go into court to obtain their just dues. When judgment was obtained each creditor had the privilege of taking sufficient goods or articles as they thought would cover the amount claimed. These were seized by the court and removed from the hotel to a place of storage awaiting the time to elapse for a public sale.

One of Mr. Pearcy's houses was selected and a verbal agreement made with the court officers that the storage for each lot of goods taken from the hotel would be 50 cents per day. I was made the custodian of the goods for safe keeping. There were two lots placed in the rooms at different dates by the court, and after the sale of the first lot the court demanded delivery, which I made. After which I asked for the rent due for the storage, amounting to $10.50. The clerk of the court gave me to understand that it was all right and that I would get the money "mañana." This in English means "to-morrow," but it seems to have no meaning in the Cuban vernacular. The first lot was delivered on December 21, and when the court demanded the delivery of the second lot, January 15, the first bill for storage was still unpaid. Hence I refused to deliver the second lot until the agreement had been complied with regarding the first lot. I agreed, however, if the judge would promise me that the bills would be paid at some definite date, that I would deliver them, but as he would not give me any satisfaction I flatly refused to give up the goods. The municipal judge thereupon had me arrested and taken before the next higher court on a criminal charge of withholding goods belonging to the court.

This higher court, after going through a lot of irrelevant red tape, evidently to impress me with the dignity of the court, stated to me the charges, to wit, for withholding from the municipal court the goods of which it had placed me in custody. I replied that it was a fact and that I proposed to hold them until I could get some satisfaction for the rent incurred, for which I was held responsible. The judge stated that I could not hold the goods for that purpose. I then asked him if the municipal court was part of the Cuban Government. He replied "Yes." I then asked if the custom-house was also a part of the Cuban Government, eliciting the same reply. I then stated to him that it was impossible for us to get a single package from the custom-house warehouse, even though the same was in a dilapidated, leaky condition, without paying every cent of storage due on it. He said that was different, but still insisted that I could not hold these goods for the storage charges. He said, however, that if I would deliver them and then present my bill to the municipal court he would see that the bill was paid, and further stated that all proceedings in the present case would be stopped. To this I consented, and then delivered the goods in question. I presented the bill to the municipal judge and he would not receive it; hence I took it to the higher judge, and much to my amazement and chagrin he stated that I would have to look to the parties that instituted the suits against the hotel and not to the municipal court. What do you think of that for chicanery?

Well, yesterday I received another notice from this higher judge to appear at his office this morning at 9 o'clock or be subject to a fine. I went there and was told by the clerk that as these proceedings had been commenced it would be necessary for me to appear at his court every Monday morning until the case was disposed of in Habana. I expressed my surprise at this new phase of annoyance and humiliation after the distinct understanding of the day before that all proceedings would be dropped if I would give up the goods. But in order to assist them in disposing of the case I decided that I would consent to come to the court every Monday morning. To this agreement I had to sign my name. After this was done and I was preparing to leave the court room I was requested to sit down, and then the clerk stated that it will be necessary for me to give a $100 bond in cash. I then saw the nigger in the wood pile, which was nothing more nor less than to get another whack at an American's money. This I refused to do, as I was not prepared to do so. He then stated that if I would declare that I had no property I could get two responsible residents to go on my bond. I told him that I had property and that I would let him know later in the day whether I would or would not give bond. I thereupon consulted with some of the best citizens of the island, and they said that I had done enough, and advised me to so notify the judge and they would stand by me to the last. I therefore went to the court prepared to tell the judge, and after waiting for half an hour I asked the clerk for permission to see the judge, as my office was locked up and I was anxious to get back. His reply was, in a most insulting tone, that if I could not wait to get out. There was no business before the judge at the time, and he could have seen me without any trouble; but they desire to make themselves very officious, especially to Americans. Such is the gratitude of the Cubans, for whom the Americans have done so much without appreciation. In fact, it seems to be the delight of Cubans to take all the advantage possible of the American population. I do not know what the result may be in this matter, but presume they will send me to jail for attempting to do my duty. But some day these Cubans will go a little too far, and there are now too many Americans on this island to fool with, and God pity them when that time comes.

Yours, truly,

JAMES M. STEERE.

NEUVA GEROME, ISLE OF PINES,
January 24, 1906.

Mr. ED. P. RYAN,
398 East Capitol street, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since writing you on the 20th instant I have been subjected to all kinds of persecution at the hands of the judge of the court of first instance. He has tried every way to get hold of some of my money, so that Cuba can keep her wheels greased. I have been obliged to put all my property out of my hands even to the necessary household goods, as I am informed that it is their intention to cause me all the annoyance possible on account of my connection with the movement to have the United States assume possession of their own property.

This is only a reflection of the position advocated by the honorable Secretary of State and it is bearing early fruit. The former judge, Delago, was bad enough for the Americans, still he did occasionally use a little judgment and ignored a few cases as too insignificant, hence he was removed, and another judge sent here for the distinct purpose of prosecuting Americans to the fullest extent possible under the peculiarities of Cuban-Spanish laws. This is evidenced by the Cuban paper La Lucha, which gave the new judge great credit in its last Sunday edition for his punishment to be inflicted on one of the so-called "new government officials" (meaning myself). This article was inspired before I was aware of any further proceedings growing out of my attempt to protect myself in the responsibility of collecting the rent for the goods held in storage for the municipal court. This is all the wrong that I have done, and as soon as the judge informed me that I could not hold the goods for the rent, as agreed to by the court that placed me in charge, I delivered them with the distinct understanding that he would assist me in collecting the rent due and would drop all these proceedings. After they recovered the goods by this ruse, proceedings have been continued and every effort made to make me give $100 bond, for the sole purpose of tacking on all kinds of costs and taking it out of the deposit. I am now told to-day that the case is to be continued in Habana, thus compelling me to go to the expense and annoyance of going there and hiring a lawyer to plead my case.

It is, of course, useless to appeal to the American minister in Habana on account of this unjust and uncalled treatment, as his attitude in the past has in nowise operated to stop persecution. Can not you get some Senator to take up this case and prevent this farce from proceeding further? I am not able to go to Habana or employ a lawyer to represent me. Hence the probabilities are that there will be a very heavy fine imposed in addition to numerous court costs, and if this is not paid by me on presentation I am liable to be cast into a Cuban prison, and if such should be the result there is no telling what the American residents might do, as these whole proceedings are so foreign to American justice they will not stand for it, and it would result in further complications for our cause. Quick action is necessary. I have given you the whole facts in my two letters. Every other nation protects its citizens, why should not ours do likewise? It does seem to me that there are some patriotic citizens in America that are more considerate of their fellow-men than to abandon them to persecution. I have always been a law-abiding citizen of the United States and can give all the references necessary to back up this assertion. I am 61 years of age and never was called into a court of justice before in my whole life, and have always held positions of honor and trust. I have always admired President Roosevelt, but I regret to see that notwithstanding his promise to carry out the policy of our late lamented William McKinley he appears anxious to deliver this possession of the United States to a people that are not fit to govern themselves, and also that he will tolerate a Secretary of State who does not stop them from persecuting us to the limit. They did not need this liberty, as they were already making it as uncomfortable for Americans as they possibly could, instead of being grateful to us for giving them their liberty—in fact, like itself. Spain would have annihilated them in a few months longer had not the United States taken up the fight for them. But this is digressing. In support of my assertions in regard to my previous conduct and character, I take the liberty of referring to Mr. W. W. Finley, of Washington, D. C., vice-president of the Southern Railway. He has known me for many years. I also refer you to the Hon. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, Senator from Texas.

It is generally understood here on the island that the present treaty is likely to be hung up indefinitely, and if this is the case something must be done to relieve the tension on the Americans here. They demand that as a safeguard to their peace and liberty the Congress of the United States send us a governor until it is fully determined what is to be done with the island. From all that I can gather the Americans will not be satisfied with amendments that will carry with them Cuban possession. It will create more friction than the Anglo-Saxon race will stand, and it is better for all concerned to have American rule pending further negotiations.

Yours, truly,

JAMES M. STEERE.

Mr. ED. P. RYAN,
No. 398 East Capitol Street, Washington, D. C.

DEAR ED.: Referring to my letters to you under date of January 20 and 24, in regard to the continuance of the proceedings against me for trying to collect the rent due for storage on the goods held for the municipal court. I am advised to-day that the court at Habana has notified this judge here to notify me that it will be necessary for me to appear in Habana on the 28th of this month, or be subject to an additional fine. This is going to place an additional hardship on me, and as I delivered these goods as soon as the judge here explained that I could not hold them for the storage charges and also agreed to see that the bill for the same was paid, and that he would drop all these proceedings, I can not see why I should be persecuted further. Neither can I see where the Cuban Government can compel my presence in Cuba for any offense committed on the Isle of Pines, as their constitution does not apply to this island until the treaty now under consideration is ratified. It seems to me, however, that they are doing as they please, without any action of the United States to the contrary. I certainly do not feel called upon to go to Habana, as the Cuban authorities have obtained all they were contending for—the possession of the goods without paying one cent of the storage charges, which are still unpaid, notwithstanding the promise of the judge to see that I got the money. I have reported to the court every Monday morning according to my promise to do so. I can not afford to get tangled up with these Cuban courts even though I know that I am right, without some backing from my own Government. It is the delight of these Cubans to soak an American at every opportunity, and this is a fair sample of their idea of justice.

American residents are becoming very restless at the condition of things in general, and some action should be taken at Washington before it becomes unbearable, and thus save trouble.

Yours, truly, JAMES M. STEERE.

As a remedy for the evils above set forth, your petitioner suggests that a committee of the Senate be appointed to make a complete examination on the ground and also in Cuba of the present conditions in the Isle of Pines and to report the same for the future action of your honorable body. The same committee should also report to the Senate what is the proper final disposition to make with regard to the title to the sovereignty over the island. He advises these steps because under present conditions some act of oppression at any moment may cause riot or bloodshed on the island, which would, in my opinion, reopen the entire Cuban question and involve the citizens of the United States in filibustering expeditions, coupled with rebellion and civil war in Cuba. The conditions at present are charged with dynamite and must be taken in hand at once to avoid endless complications.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Personally appeared before me James M. Steere, of Nueva Gerona, Isle of Pines, West Indies, and after being duly sworn deposes and says that all the facts alleged in the above petition to Congress and in the letters to Mr. Ryan embodied therein are true and correct to the best of his personal knowledge and belief.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 22d day of March, A. D. 1906.

[SEAL.] BENJ. VAIL, Notary Public.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

James M. Steere, first being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a resident of the Isle of Pines and that he has been a resident of that island for the past year; that he was present when a committee was recently appointed at a mass meeting of American citizens at Nueva Gerona, on the Isle of Pines, March 1, 1906, consisting of R. P. Ewing, Driver Fullton, and E. C. Rogers, with such assistance as might be needed, to take a census of the people living on the island, without in any way interfering with the rights of any person resident on said island. It was deemed necessary that such a census should be taken in order that the truth should be given to the Senate of the United States and to the world regarding the continued and persistent misstatements to the effect that only a few land speculators from the United States held property on the island and that the great majority of residents and property owners were Cubans. Particular instructions were given to the members of this census committee to ask no questions of individuals in the course of their census taking which might offend Cuban sensibilities. Each member of the committee, it was understood, knew in a general way the number of people in each household of the district he was assigned to. The Cubans, however, discovered the personality of two of the committee, namely Messrs. Driver Fullton and H. A. Mayer. Fullton was arrested, and after being threatened by the alcalde with imprisonment if he persisted in taking the census, was allowed to go. He feared subsequent proceedings and left the island.

As regards Mr. Mayer, more stringent measures were attempted. The assistant alcalde, accompanied by a Cuban rural guard, went to his home and made threats of arrest, and during the argument which followed it was stated by Mr. and Mrs. Mayer that the assistant alcalde used toward Mrs. Mayer a grossly indecent epithet. This caused Mayer to threaten to break the assistant alcalde's neck, but fearing the Cuban law, which is usually administered in the Isle of Pines so as to convict the American and allow the Cuban to escape, he desisted in assault on the offender.

Mr. Mayer afterwards had the assistant alcalde arrested for insulting his wife, but when the case was brought up for trial the court refused to allow either Mayer or his wife or his brother-in-law, who was present, to testify as to the insult, on the ground that the Cuban law does not allow interested parties to testify in criminal cases. There being no accusing witnesses who would be allowed to testify, the assistant alcalde was triumphantly acquitted, while Mr. Mayer was fined $5 for bringing a case against an official or else for attempting to take a census. No reason was given for imposing the fine.

This outrage has greatly incensed Americans living on the island, who, under all conditions, respect their wives and mothers, and it is liable to cause future trouble and perhaps bloodshed. It is needless to call attention to the fact that Americans will not long submit to this kind of law administered, as it is always, in favor of the office-holding Cuban classes.

[From the Habana Daily Telegraph, Tuesday, March 13, 1906.]

ON ISLE OF PINES—SAID THAT AMERICANS THERE HAVE DECLARED INDEPENDENCE.

The following note was yesterday given out to the press by rural guard headquarters:

"The chief of the detachment of the rural guards on the Isle of Pines sends word that a group of Americans residing in the island have met and decided to declare the island independent of Cuba, and the person presiding at the meeting undertook to communicate what had been done to the administrator of customs there."

A representative of the Telegraph called upon Secretary Freyre de Andrade to inquire if he had received any further details regarding the matter, but the secretary said he had not, and treated the report as of no consequence whatsoever.

Governor of the province, Gen. Emilio Nuñez, was also called upon, and also said that he had heard nothing whatsoever regarding the matter beyond the rural-guard report. The governor said that there was no particular alarm in the adoption of such resolutions as long as they were not acted up to, and that the collector of customs on the isle would probably show no resentment when informed of them.

The governor said, however, that heretofore the Cuban Government had not insisted on the payment of taxes on the island, but had now started in to collect them. He considered the amendment to the Isle of Pines treaty, presented by Senators BACON and SPOONER, an impossible proposition, as, in his opinion, its enactment would require a radical change in the Cuban constitution, which provides for only six provinces and no territories. The governor did not, however, think that any serious trouble was imminent on the disputed islet.

Señor Villalon, of Secretary Freyre de Andrade's department, seemed to take the thing more seriously than his chief, and when asked about it by another reporter of the Telegraph stated that the rural guards had received instructions to shoot the Americans the moment the latter should commit any act of rebellion against Cuban sovereignty.

As there is now wireless communication between Cuba and the isle it is safe to say, however, that nothing of any moment occurred when the chairman of the territorialist meeting handed in his chestnut.

[The Sun, Monday, March 5, 1906.]

ON THE ISLE OF PINES—AN AMERICAN WHO FAVORS CUBAN GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of The Sun.

SIR: It is the business of a little band of political agitators and land boomers on this end of the Isle of Pines to meet all American tourists and to keep their minds occupied with harrowing tales of Cuban atrocities and with stories of profits which would be sure to accrue to all holders of island real estate should Uncle Sam drive the "hated" Cubans off the island. Of course all this is more or less entertaining to the tourists, that depending chiefly upon their digestive organs, and has earned for the boomers the expressive appellation of "that crowd."

The statement is made in the literature sent out by the would-be revolutionists that it would be humiliating to a great degree for the Americans here to be governed by "an inferior people." I can say as missionary pastor here that I have failed to discover such inferiority. True, there are people here of a low order of civilization, but in any comparisons which may be made one must take into consideration the disadvantages under which these poor people have been by way of education, etc. It must be distinctly understood, however, that this is not the class which does the governing.

I number among my friends no more courteous or obliging gentlemen than the Cuban officials on the Isle of Pines. They rank with our best class of American citizens, and when compared with those who would belittle them, in education, integrity, courtliness of manners, and good citizenship, the superiority of the Cubans is quite apparent.

I wish to appeal to the sense of honor and Christian charity of the American people in making their decision upon this Isle of Pines affair. The Cuban people believe the American people to be their friends. They do not believe that "La Gran Republica" could perform one of the grandest acts in the history of any nation—that of fighting and winning a victory for a downtrodden people—and then say to them: "Your country is yours; work out your political salvation and we will help you in such ways as may seem advisable to maintain your government as an independent republic," for selfish reasons. No; the Cuban people believe in the American people and in their high ideals. They do not believe that that august body, the great American Senate, will permit the great injustice to be done them of taking from them this little island, which never could be of any real benefit to our Government, but which would be a bill of expense continually.

In looking for ideals to weave into the social fabric of Cuba, her people look for the best that is to be had from their friends of the great Republic, and if Cuba is to construct a government which will stand, she must do so on the foundation that has withstood the onslaughts of time, upon truths which are as eternal as the heavens, because they are of God who is eternal; upon an abiding faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as the Savior and character builder for the human race, knowing that great governments are but the reflex of national character, and can be had in the smallest republic as well as the greatest.

For a working example of such a government it is natural that the Cuban people should look to their benefactor, the United States of America, whose statesmen have for the most part been actuated by the thought and sustained by the idea that unsullied reputation in the individual is the first great step toward national greatness.

KENNETH M. DEDRICK.

NUEVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES, February 22, 1906.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22, 1906.

DEAR SENATOR MORGAN: As requested, I give you a list of such persons interested in the Isle of Pines who are from Cincinnati and vicinity. I have only included such as are personal friends and neighbors; there are many more with whom I am not personally acquainted—in all about 100—they are all small landholders who invested under the belief that the island would remain under the jurisdiction of the United States. At present some of them are residents on the island, some have their representatives there who are getting their land under cultivation, planting orange groves, etc., and all hope at some time to make the island their permanent winter home.

To the most of them the ceding of the island to Cuba would fall as a great calamity. Many of them have invested the savings of years, believing they were preparing a winter home in this delightful climate under the American flag in which to spend their declining years.

Admitting that they had no right to accept the assurances of Assistant Secretary of War, Governor-General Wood, and other officials of this Government, as intimated in the majority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the fact remains that they have done so and stand to suffer considerably by this change of front on the part of this Government. We therefore, as American citizens, demand the most earnest consideration of the question before action is taken on the proposed treaty, believing that a way can be found out of this difficulty which will work no such injustice as would result from the proposed action.

Yours, respectfully, ARCHIBALD FRIES.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be taken up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I offered to the bill, and to which I desire to address myself, may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 8 of the bill and to insert the following:

On the passage of this act an Interstate Commerce Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take the place of the present Interstate Commerce Commission. Said Commission shall consist of nine members, one for and from each judicial circuit of the United States. Not more than five members of said Commission shall be of the same political party; at least three of said Commission shall be lawyers of good and regular standing at the bar, and three others shall be persons of experience in the management and operation of railroads. Three members of said Commission shall be appointed for three years, three shall be appointed for six years, and three for nine years, and all subsequent appointments made on the expiration of a term of service shall be for nine years. Any Commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, and vacancies caused by death, removal, or resignation shall be filled by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, by appointments for the remainder of the unexpired terms. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall receive $12,000 compensation annually, and the chairman of the Commission, who shall be a lawyer, $12,500.

No person owning stock or bonds of any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of such office or at any time hold the same. Said Commissioners shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. No vacancy in the Commission shall impair the right of the remaining Commissioners to exercise all the powers of the Commission. All laws and parts of laws conferring powers and imposing duties upon or otherwise relating to the heretofore existing Interstate Commerce Commission shall continue in full force and effect and be applicable to the Interstate Commerce Commission established by this act, except as herein otherwise provided.

All the proceedings depending before the heretofore existing Interstate Commerce Commission at the time this act shall take effect shall, without break or interruption, be deemed to be depending before the Commission established by this section, and shall continue on to conclusion before the new Commission.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment was founded upon one which was offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] at the last session of Congress. I prepared it after consultation with Senators on both sides of the Chamber, I hope that it may receive the attention of the Senate and if there are changes which will improve and perfect it I trust they will be made.

The purpose of the amendment is apparent upon its face. It is an effort, so far as it can be done by law, to give to this Commission by salary and by tenure of office all the strength and dignity which it is possible to confer. When one of the Commissioners appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate he stated that he did not think an increase of salary was of much importance; that there would be no difficulty in getting suitable men for this Commission, just as it was always possible to get good men for the courts. It seems to me that that is a mistaken idea. Nothing can give to any executive commission, the creature of yesterday, the dignity which pertains to and adheres in a court. The courts and the judges represent centuries of tradition. They have been the arbiters of life and death. They have been the support of power, and in later days the sure defense of personal rights and personal liberty. They have in almost all the history of the English-speaking race, and, indeed, of all civilized nations, filled a great place, and about them have gathered that indefinable respect and reverence which time alone can give. But this Commission has, and necessarily can have, none of these qualities except what an act of Congress can confer. Therefore, Mr. President, it seems very important to do all in our power to elevate its character and assure its ability so far as is possible by law.

There seems to be a tacit assumption in all the discussion which has gone on here that if a matter is referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission all will be well; that they, like the king in the English maxim, can do no wrong. Yet they are, after all, men and fallible like the rest of us. I think we have not paused enough to consider how immensely important are the functions to which we are about to call this body of men by the bill which we now have under consideration, and I wish to touch briefly on some of the duties which we expect those officers to perform.

The great importance of our railroad system is well known, and in a general way is constantly stated; but I desire, if I can, to bring it home a little more forcibly by some details. Burke said in a very famous speech that "small minds and great empires went ill together," and certainly what is true of a great empire, as he then contemplated the governments of the world, is true of this Interstate Commerce Commission. After they are clothed with the powers which we propose to confer upon them they will be able to affect the welfare of more people, and the value of infinitely more property, than could have been affected by the act of any monarch ruling in Europe at the time when Burke made his great speech on conciliation with America.

We call upon them primarily to decide as to the rates to be established by the railroads. We know that that is a large question; but, Mr. President, I confess I did not realize how large and intricate a question it was until I had made some careful investigations in regard to the interdependence of rates. I desire to read at this point a brief statement which I have had prepared in regard to that matter. The facts given are somewhat dry, but it brings home, I think, better than anything I have yet been able to find, the enormous complication and importance of the questions which this Commission will be called upon to decide from day to day and in the course of the work imposed upon them.

The course of the railroads of the United States has naturally been laid between the industrial and commercial centers, between places of production and the various markets. The early railroads were built after this tendency from and to the cities which had grown to be commercial centers principally because of their advantageous position for the conduct of traffic by water—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston because of their harbors on the Atlantic and the Gulf; Pittsburg, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Detroit, St. Louis, and Chicago because of their favorable situation on the inland waterways. The development of the western grain fields, to which Chicago was the natural gateway, and the great traffic which ensued between Chicago and New York led to the building of numerous railroads, which competed with the water routes between those cities. Second in importance were the channels of traffic between New York and Cincinnati and St. Louis, which led to the building of competing railroads between those cities and to Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, seaports competing with New York. The traffic between any one of these western cities and any one of these eastern cities, whether eastbound or westbound, came into competition with the traffic between any other eastern and western city, it being evident that certain regions beyond Chicago could also be reached via St. Louis, that certain regions beyond St. Louis could also be reached via Cincinnati, and that the entire European market could be reached through either Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. The contests between these different commercial centers and seaports and the railroads connecting them gave rise to rate wars which were fierce and almost continuous until, after many tentative compromises, there was attained the rate adjustment which is in effect to-day. By reason of the volume of traffic which flows between them the rate between Chicago and New York is the basis to which practically all the rates east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio rivers are adjusted. The rates between New York and Chicago, which are the result of contests which have been fought to a finish by the railroads and the communities concerned, are designated as 100 per cent rates. The rates to and from intermediate cities and territories have also been arrived at through contest and compromise and are established as percentages of the 100 per cent rate—that is, the rate from New York to Pittsburg is 60 per cent; to Cleveland, 71 per cent; to Detroit, 78 per cent; to Indianapolis, 93 per cent; Peoria, 110 per cent, and to St. Louis, 116 per cent of the New York-Chicago rate. By arbitration and other adjustment the rates to and from Philadelphia and Baltimore bear a fixed relation to the New York-Chicago rate. Rates from Boston and interior New England points, rates from the territory surrounding Buffalo and Pittsburg, and from other interior points are established in relation to the New York-Chicago rate, as well as rates to and from Norfolk and other points in Virginia. Rates in the opposite direction—that is, from Chicago to New York—are also considered as 100 per cent, upon which basis are likewise made practically all the West to East rates from points on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and the territory north and east thereof.

If, therefore, a railroad rate upon an article of general production and consumption is reduced between an eastern and a western point in the territory specified, the equities and rivalries of other producing and consuming localities and the competition of carriers produce the following results:

(1) All railroad rates are reduced between all eastern and all western points in the territory described.

(2) Rates for combined rail and lake transportation are reduced.

(3) Rates via the Erie Canal and the Great Lakes are reduced to maintain the difference between them and the all-rail rates and the rail-and-lake rates.

(4) Rates on through traffic from and to points west of the Mississippi River and from and to points south of the Ohio River are reduced.

(5) Rates may be reduced to and from points in Canada. It has been estimated that a change in one of the rate bases mentioned has forced the changing of not less that 8,000 rates.

Upon the 60 per cent of the Chicago-New York rate fixed for Pittsburg are based, as the result of many years of controversy between competing manufacturers and rate wars between the railroads serving the several districts, the fixed differences for rates from the Mahoning and Shenango valleys, which are 40 cents per ton higher than the Pittsburg rate; from the Cleveland district, which is 60 cents per ton higher than the Pittsburg rate, and from the Johnstown district, which is 30 cents per ton less to the East than the Pittsburg rate. The rates on the raw materials that enter into the manufacture of pig iron—coke, ore, and limestone—to the Pittsburg, the Mahoning Valley, the Shenango Valley, and the Wheeling districts are adjusted in equilibrium so delicate that a change in the rate on ore, coke, or limestone to either of these districts would necessitate a change in the rates on these commodities to the other districts or else a change in the rate on the manufactured iron and steel from the district in which the rates on the raw material had not been adjusted. Likewise a serious reduction in the rates on the products of the furnaces at South Chicago and Joliet will necessitate changes from the Pittsburg district, and therefore from the Wheeling, Mahoning Valley, Shenango Valley, and Cleveland districts.

The adjustment of rates to and from points in the territory south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi rivers depends not only upon the rates that are made from the West to the crossing points on the Mississippi and from the North to Cairo, Evansville, Louisville, Cincinnati, and other crossing points on the Ohio River, but on the rates by water from New York and Baltimore on the east and on rates from New Orleans and Mobile in connection with the water lines to those points.

What follows the changing of one important rate in this southern territory is exemplified by the following statement of what happened as a consequence of a recent change in rates from Baltimore to Atlanta and Louisville to Atlanta. Rates corresponding to the reduction from Baltimore were made from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and the other eastern seaports as well as from all interior Eastern and New England cities to Atlanta. Reductions corresponding to that from Louisville were made from Cincinnati, Evansville, Cairo, and Memphis. These reductions from the eastern seaports and the Ohio and Mississippi River crossings necessitated a reduction in the rates from every point in the United States north or west of these gateways, and likewise a relative reduction from Virginia cities to Atlanta and reduction from the South Atlantic ports of Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, and Brunswick. The changes in these rates to Atlanta forced corresponding change to the neighboring city of Nashville and a proportionate reduction to Chattanooga, Macon, Columbus, and other cities in Georgia. The change at Chattanooga in turn affected rates from Florence, Sheffield, and Decatur; from Knoxville, Montgomery, Selma, and Birmingham, as well as from New Orleans and Mobile. This change in the rates to Atlanta also ramified throughout Virginia and the Carolinas, the total changes necessitated by the initial change being not less than a hundred thousand.

Another traffic current which affects rates throughout a wide territory and in multiplied ramifications is that between Chicago and St. Louis and New Orleans. The roads tributary to this port naturally work to develop its traffic, with the result that lines leading from the grain and grazing regions of the West to the Atlantic seaports have had to make certain revisions in their rates. A reduction in the grain rate made in January of last year from Kansas City to Galveston forced reductions in rates on grain from the territory beyond and via Kansas City and Omaha not only to New Orleans, but to New York and Baltimore. Reductions were also forced to New Orleans from all stations in the grain-raising States of South Dakota, Iowa, Minnesota, and Illinois.

Changes similar to those which have been specified as following the modification of a rate from Louisville to a southern point also follow the change in a rate from St. Louis to New Orleans or other southern distributing point. In such a case the ramifications begin at Buffalo and Pittsburg and extend westward to Arkansas, Indian Territory, Oklahoma, and New Mexico, affecting the rates from these regions to points south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi rivers. Changes in rates that affect New Orleans and other points in Louisiana also affect the rates to and from Texas, the present adjustment of rates to and from Texas and Louisiana being as delicate as that in other regions of the South where, as we have seen, a reduction in one rate may demolish the entire structure.

The growth of population in the Mississippi and Missouri valleys has brought about a development of industry and commerce which causes an extensive interchange of traffic between the communities that range from Minnesota and Wisconsin to Tennessee and Arkansas and from the Dakotas to Colorado and Oklahoma. It is obvious that to and from many places in these regions traffic can cross the Mississippi or Missouri rivers at any one of several gateways. Therefore there has grown up a rate adjustment for this traffic the interdependence of which may be illustrated by a reduction in the rates on buggies, carriages, and spring wagons recently made from Freeport, Ill., to points in Iowa, which immediately brought about corresponding reductions from Chicago, Peoria, St. Louis, and Dallas, and then reductions from Milwaukee, Racine, Madison, Janesville, Beloit, Wis., Kankakee, Bloomington, Decatur, and other points in Illinois to all points in Iowa and Wisconsin. These reductions spread from all shipping points east of the Illinois-Indiana State line to all points west of the Mississippi River. A reduction in the rate on wire and nails from Chicago to Denver brought similar reductions from other Illinois to all Colorado points, and had the effect of reducing the rates on wire and nails eastbound from the Colorado mills through all of the Missouri River gateways. The interrelation of rates in this region may be summarized by the statement that a change in a rate between St. Louis and either Kansas City, St. Joseph, Atchison, Leavenworth, Nebraska City, Omaha, or Council Bluffs immediately changes the rate to each other of these Missouri River gateways and automatically reduces the rates between Memphis, St. Louis, Peoria, Chicago, St. Paul, Duluth, Sioux City, Sioux Falls, and all points between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains.

The rates from St. Louis, Mo., to St. Paul and Minneapolis are on an established basis, attained after compromise through the customary period of warfare, of 105 per cent of the rates from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis; the Chicago rates apply throughout Illinois as far south as Peoria, Decatur, and Springfield. The rates from Chicago and Des Moines are made a percentage of the rates from St. Louis to Des Moines, and the rates from Chicago to interior points in Iowa, such as Cedar Rapids, Ottumwa, and Marshalltown, bear a fixed relation to the rates from Chicago to Des Moines. The rates from St. Louis to Des Moines are fixed upon the rates from St. Louis to St. Paul and Minneapolis. Therefore a reduction in a rate from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis would result in a corresponding change from St. Louis to these cities, which, in turn, would change the rate from St. Louis to Des Moines, which would change the rate from Chicago to Des Moines, and likewise the rates from Chicago to Cedar Rapids, Ottumwa, and Marshalltown.

The complications which beset the making of rates between the regions east of the Rocky Mountains have their effect upon the rates to and from the Pacific coast, which also must be kept in certain adjustment with the ocean rates, a change in the through rate via any route from any place of production in the East necessitating a change via any other route to any seaport competing with another seaport for the trade of the interior. It is the same with the rates from the Pacific coast. For example, canned, dried, and green fruit and vegetables produced in California, Oregon, and Idaho compete with one another not only in the West, but pretty much throughout the United States and in certain parts of Europe. A change in the rate on any one of these commodities via any route from any producing center would bring about corresponding changes via other routes from the same and other producing centers.

As another example, sugar is produced and refined in Texas and Louisiana and also in Colorado, Utah, Idaho, and in California; sugar from Cuba is imported and refined at New York and Philadelphia. All of these places of production and refining compete for the markets of the Mississippi and Missouri valleys. Therefore a change in the rate on sugar from California to a Missouri Valley distributing center would probably cause a change in the rate on sugar from New York, Philadelphia, Utah, and Colorado. A change in the rate on any commodity from St. Paul to Butte, a distributing center of Montana, would cause a change in the rate from every crossing point on the Missouri River to the distributing points not only in Montana, but in Utah and Idaho.

In a word, the merchants of Chicago, St. Louis, St. Paul, Duluth, Sioux City, Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, Salt Lake City, Butte, Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Galveston, and New Orleans are all competing to a greater or less degree for the trade of the entire territory between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. The rate adjustment now existing is the result of experience, of competition between carriers, competition between communities, competition between the producers and between the distributers. It is an adjustment that is ever in unstable equilibrium, changes constantly being made to meet the fluctuating conditions of industry and commerce which in this region are peculiarly and intensely energetic.

For the grazing grounds which range from the Canadian boundary to the line of the Union Pacific Railway Chicago is the controlling market. If the rate for beeves from any point in this vast region to Chicago is reduced, corresponding reductions must be made from the adjoining points, and these reductions affect the rates from all other points on the various railroads leading from that territory. As the cattle are on the hoof and can be shifted from one end of a range to another, often over a distance of two or three hundred miles, without damage or increased expense, this shifting can readily be made to a station on a road which has reduced its rates and away from the railroad that has not made a corresponding reduction. An attempt to adjust live-stock rates through the Interstate Commerce Commission necessitated the inclusion in the complaint by certain of the live-stock interests of all the railroads between Canada and Texas. But be it said that the complaint was far from unanimous, many shippers expressing entire satisfaction with the status.

An interesting example of competition arose out of the enormous demand for flour in China and Japan during the recent war. Enormous purchases were made from the Minneapolis millers, who were quoted rates via the Atlantic seaboard and the Suez Canal. The railroads leading to the Pacific coast were enabled, by the necessity of transporting cars to the coast to bring east products of the Northwest and of the Orient, to quote the low rates necessary to secure shipments of this flour from Minneapolis to the Orient via Puget Sound. This rate, established solely to obtain this particular and temporary traffic, was so low as to cause the millers and farmers at interior points on the Pacific coast to demand correspondingly low rates on their shipments for domestic consumption at the coast. As it was impossible to grant their request, the low rates from Minneapolis were withdrawn.

The exposition just made applies to that interdependence of railroad freight rates which grows out of the competition between railroads, between communities, between producing centers and markets. There is another phase of this interdependence which grows out of the relation and competition between commodities themselves. It is a general principle that crude or raw materials should, other things being equal, pay lower railroad rates than the manufactured products. Therefore, for example—

(1) Rates on pig iron are lower than rates on steel billets, blooms, and ingots, which rates in their turn are lower than those upon finished iron or steel products.

(2) Animal hides are accorded lower rates than leather.

(3) Wool and cotton are accorded lower rates than woolen and cotton fabrics.

(4) Rates on live stock are less than on dressed beef, and less on hogs than on hams and other provisions.

(5) The rates on ore are less than on bullion and matte.

(6) Rates on lumber are less than on products manufactured therefrom.

(7) Rates on denims are less than on overalls and jumpers.

It therefore follows that a change in the rate on a finished product or on a raw material which is a factor in its production may necessitate changes on the other kinds of raw material and on the finished product. For example, a change in the rate on lumber would result in a corresponding change on articles taking lumber rates, such as lath, shingles, telegraph and telephone poles, and upon articles manufactured from lumber and taking higher rates, such as sash, doors, blinds, and interior finish; or, as another example, a change in the rate on sulphur to paper-manufacturing points would result in corresponding changes on other articles of paper stock, such as brimstone, caustic, soda, kaolin, copperas, potash, soda ash, resin, ground clay, and ground rock.

That competition known in economics as "substitution"—the use of one commodity in the stead of another if there is too great a variant in the price—compels the railroads in behalf of established industries to maintain a certain relative adjustment in the rates on competing commodities, for example, as follows:

(1) Soap, soap extracts, soap powders, washing compounds, washing powders, and washing crystals, all of which are used for cleansing purposes and are commercially competitive.

(2) Glue (animal product), dextrin (vegetable product), casein or milk curd (animal product), all of which are adhesives largely used for manufacturing purposes and directly competitive.

(3) Hemp, sisal, manila, and jute, all vegetable fibers, directly competitive in the manufacture of rope and twine.

(4) Strawboard, wood-pulp board, binder's board, box board, news board, and chip board.

(5) Corundum, carborundum, and emerald.

(6) The different kinds of paint.

(7) The different kinds of paper.

(8) Copper wire, copper rope, copper cable, insulated wire, insulated cable.

(9) Wrought-iron pipe, cast-iron pipe, all iron and steel tubes.

(10) Rolled oats and all cereal foods.

(11) Raisins, dried prunes, dried peaches, dried apricots, dried pears.

(12) Canned salmon and all other canned fish.

(13) Canned fruits and canned vegetables.

This analysis of rates, Mr. President, is simply to show the fact which I desire to call especial attention to—that these railroad rates are all interdependent and interlaced and that when you decide as to one rate you may affect ten thousand rates covering a third or a half of the United States, and that means affecting for weal or woe the daily business of all that great area.

But, Mr. President, this is not all by any means which the Interstate Commerce Commission is called upon to do. I have not the slightest intention of casting any reflection whatever upon the able and distinguished gentlemen who now occupy those important positions. They have been eulogized by the eloquent and distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], and he has pointed out to attentive consideration the ten volumes of their reports, which is certainly, as he said, a monument of industry, if nothing else. But that is not all. This Commission has been engaged in promoting and advocating legislation. I find, in the testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Committee on the 8th day of December, 1899, that the following proceedings were had in the Interstate Commerce Commission:

PROUTY EXHIBIT A.

At a general session of the Interstate Commerce Commission, held at its office in Washington, D. C., on the 8th day of December, A. D. 1899.

Present: Hon. Martin A. Knapp, chairman; Hon. Judson C. Clements, Hon. James D. Yeomans, Hon. Charles A. Prouty, Commissioners.

The following proceedings were had, to wit:

AMENDMENT OF THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Cooperation with certain mercantile organizations to secure the adoption of amendments to the act to regulate commerce being under consideration,

It was unanimously voted to instruct the Secretary to cooperate with the representatives of these organizations for the purpose of securing the adoption of necessary amendments, and particularly the passage of a bill which has been approved by such organizations at a meeting held in Chicago on November 22, 1899, and to that end to give the public information as to the present state of the law and the necessity for amending it by distributing such reports, papers, and documents as are designed to accomplish that purpose, and to devote himself assiduously to such duty.

A true copy.

[SEAL.] EDW. A. MOSELEY, Secretary.

That was a formal order of the Commission to enter, in conjunction with mercantile organizations throughout the country, upon a general campaign in favor of amendments they thought proper to the interstate-commerce act in order to enlarge their own powers. There follows on the next page, which I will not read, a circular which they subsequently sent out.

Mr. FORAKER (to Mr. LODGE). Why not insert it?

Mr. LODGE. Very well, I will insert the whole of this statement, including the order of the Commission and the circular.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the nature of the circular?

Mr. LODGE. It refers to Senate bill 1439, introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and then advocates the changes proposed in that bill. It was circulated throughout the country in order to secure support for that measure, which had the approval of the Commission.

The circular letter referred to is as follows:

Inclosed please find copy of Senate bill No. 1439, introduced by Senator CULLOM December 12, 1899, which embodies provisions amendatory of the act to regulate commerce. The bill is designed to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority intended to be conferred by Congress when the law was originally enacted.

A few railroad officials and some newspapers have charged that the Commission by recommending these amendments is seeking unlimited authority to make rates. This charge is entirely without foundation. The Commission neither asks nor desires to be invested with general rate-making power. It simply asks for authority to correct rates which have been previously established by the carriers in the full exercise of their rate-making power, when such rates are found by the Commission, after due notice, investigation, and full hearing, to be in violation of the act; and the Commission asks this because experience has demonstrated that there is practically no other way by which the public can be protected against excessive or unjustly discriminative rates.

It has been asserted in some quarters that the powers asked for in this regard would imperil the commercial interests of the country. This statement is altogether erroneous. On the contrary, the passage of this measure would conserve the interests of producers, manufacturers, and shippers generally, while protecting the rights of the carriers. On November 22, 1899, this bill was submitted to a convention composed of representatives of leading commercial and industrial organizations of the country at Chicago. There were present authorized delegates from the Millers' National Association of the United States, the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States, the National Business League, the National Board of Trade, the National Transportation Association, the National Live Stock Association, the United States Brewers' Association, the Vapor Stove Manufacturers' National Association, the National Hay Association, the National Association of Freight Commissioners, and others.

After carefully considering the measure section by section it was approved by the conference. Since that time more than twenty other national business associations have expressed their approval of the bill. The shippers of the country, therefore, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, seek such amendment as will empower the Commission to proceed on the lines and to the ends contemplated by the original act. The language and phraseology of that act, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States in various decisions, has been found insufficient to authorize the procedure and action necessary to give effect to its purpose. The language of the proposed amendments is believed to be so clear as to admit of no misinterpretation.

Your attention is particularly called to the fact that the authority to correct rates which have been found to be unlawful is neither arbitrary nor final under the provisions of this bill. In every case the carriers must have due notice and opportunity to be heard before any change in rates can be ordered, and all orders of this character are made subject to review by a circuit court of the United States and by the Supreme Court of the United States.

As already stated, the sole purpose of these amendments is to furnish the means of enforcing the present provisions of the law against unreasonable rates and unjust discriminations, and to that end to confer upon the Commission the degree of authority respecting rates which for ten years it was supposed to have, but which the Supreme Court has declared it does not possess.

If the general features of the bill as above outlined meet your approval, it is respectfully suggested that you take action expressing your approbation and support to the Senators and Representatives from your State and to the Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the United States Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, either alone or with others, or by petition or otherwise.

I would be glad to hear from you in respect to the matter, and would be pleased to receive advice of any action which you may take and copies of any letters, petitions, or other documents which may be forwarded to Senators and Representatives or either of the committees.

Very respectfully,

EDW. A. MOSELEY, Secretary.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to be informed by the Senator as to the impropriety of that, and how far it differs from the activity of other Departments of the Government in making recommendations for bringing the law into harmony with the good of the public service?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Iowa seeks to defend what I have not attacked. I have not attacked the Commission for doing that nor have I reflected upon them. I am pointing out that this is a great function which they are filling; and I was going on to say that in the resolution in which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is so much interested, although he is such a relentless opponent of executive power, the Commission are specifically authorized and invited to suggest legislation to Congress.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I had that resolution in mind; and my recollection is that it passed the Senate by a unanimous vote of the body.

Mr. LODGE. It did; and I have not yet criticised the Commission. I am pointing out the duties which are placed upon them. Without that resolution, however, they have been doing that work; they have been——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he bears in mind the fact that the original interstate-commerce act calls upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make recommendations to Congress from time to time in regard to legislation?

Mr. LODGE. I had forgotten that they were called upon to make recommendations to Congress. But I am finding no fault with their making recommendations. My point is that that body will have, in addition to the duties they have to perform under this act, very large additional duties in preparing legislation and advocating the enlargement of their own powers when they find them too small or are overruled by the courts.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I rise only to suggest that there is certainly a very wide difference that must be manifest to anyone the moment he thinks about it, between making an official recommendation, in accordance with the requirements of a statute, and organizing a propaganda, and in carrying out the particular purpose, writing, preparing, and distributing literature in behalf of a purpose connected with legislation.

I remember that during the last two or three years there has been a great outcry because the letter carriers of the United States have had the presumption to ask, through their organization, that their pay might be increased. That has been thought to be very wrong indeed, and they have been criticised and threatened with dismissal from the service if they persisted in it. That same rule has been applied to others who are engaged in the public service; and the rule prohibiting men who are engaged in the public service becoming the promoters of particular ideas with respect to legislation has been, as I think, generally approved.

I did not rise to criticise the Interstate Commerce Commission, but only to call attention to this fact. I know in all the newspapers it was commented on when this convention was held in Chicago last August, I think it was, that a representative of the Interstate Commerce Commission was there, acting as a sort of secretary; that he had much to do with the marshaling of many civic and commercial bodies and organizations that were represented there; and it was charged that some of them existed only on paper. I do not know what the fact is, but it showed how thoroughly an organization may be brought into bad repute when they go into that kind of business. I think it is bad practice.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the resolution to which I referred authorized the Commission to make suggestions to Congress, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] calls my attention to the fact that they were invited to give recommendations under the original law. I do not question their right at all, but I merely desired to point out that it was a very important duty to impose on any executive board.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Nevada having called attention to it, I have looked up the original act, and I find in it this section:

SEC. 21. That the Commission shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report to the Secretary of the Interior, which shall be by him transmitted to Congress, and copies of which shall be distributed as are the other reports issued from the Interior Department. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the Commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of commerce, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation relating thereto as the Commission may deem necessary.

Now, it has occurred to me—it is not my function or purpose to rush in to defend the Commission, and the Senator from Massachusetts says he is not attacking them——

Mr. LODGE. I have not attacked them.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has seemed to indulge in some very caustic criticisms. I want to remark that after the decision of the Supreme Court in 1897, practically destroying the Commission except as a body of statisticians and arbitrators or conciliators, as we have had them described in the Interstate Commerce Committee, these people, I presume, were afraid that their functions would become so useless that they would be legislated out of office some day, and they were probably considering whether or not they had not better hustle about and attract attention to the worthlessness of the Commission in order to let people see that, if they were to be of any use, there must be some amendment to the law.

Mr. LODGE. I think, Mr. President, that their minds probably worked very much in that way, but, of course, if it is to be held that when the court overrules a decision of some board of this kind, then the board is to immediately go to work and get the law changed so as to accord with their view of it, there is nothing further to be said. The law and the recent resolution authorized them, invited them, to suggest legislation. I say it is an important duty. I do not find, however, in any law that they are called upon or invited to carry on a public agitation throughout the country, as they have done by writings, by speeches, and by circulars. That work has been done very actively and very thoroughly. In illustration of it I shall presently call attention to a speech which one of ablest and most distinguished of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners has recently made.

But my point now is this, Mr. President: If we are creating a board of Interstate Commerce Commissioners who are to be in the operation and discharge of their functions judge, jury, and prosecuting officer, resembling nothing that I can think of except the French juge d'instruction, if they have those multiplied powers, to begin with, and in addition are to be charged with preparing and recommending legislation for Congress, with making investigations into the general business of the country, and with carrying on a perpetual discussion about all railroad legislation, I say, Mr. President, we can not go too far in our effort to secure for those positions the highest talent and the highest character which the country affords.

Now, I desire to call attention a little in detail to the objects and purposes of this amendment:

> Said Commission shall consist of nine members, one for and from each judicial circuit of the United States.

That is a rough way—the only way that suggested itself to me or to others—of getting a proper representation of the different sections of the country upon this Commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator examined to find out whether or not that would be giving a proper distribution of representation on the Commission?

Mr. LODGE. I said it was a rough way of reaching it. Unless we go to work and make up districts ourselves, and say there shall be one from each of the districts set forth in the act, I know of no better way of getting at it. It seems to me it is a desirable result, but if there is a better way of attaining it, and the Senator from South Carolina will suggest the method, I shall very gladly adopt it. My only desire is to get a proper representation of the different sections of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had naturally drifted into the idea, along with others, that nine was a very desirable number of Commissioners. We think there ought to be an increase, and as there are nine judicial circuits, one from each circuit would probably distribute the members of the Commission geographically in a fair and proper manner; but I find such inequalities in the circuits as to population, area, railroad mileage, and the number of complaints that have come to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that it would seem, upon a little examination of a map which I had prepared, but can not put my hand on at the moment—I will get it before this debate is over—that that is wholly inappropriate and would be unfair and unwise. If we are going to say they must come from any particular place or section, we would have to divide the country anew. I will illustrate that by reciting from memory that I think the first judicial circuit has only about 6,000 miles of railroad in it, whereas there is a circuit down on the Gulf which has 30,000 miles of railroad in it. That is a mere illustration of the inequality that would come from judicial-circuit distribution. I will present the map later. I have had it prepared and will get it.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that business is a better test than mileage, but I am perfectly willing to accept any fair scheme which will distribute nine commissioners so as to give representation to the different sections of the country. I think that it is well to increase the number with that same purpose in view. Take as an illustration the present Commission, which consists of five members. There is one Commissioner from Vermont, one from close by in New York, one from Georgia, one from Missouri, and a new one from California has just been named. There is the great Middle West entirely without representation, and the Northwest, and a large part of the Southwest with no representation on that Commission. I doubt if it is possible with only five Commissioners to get any proper geographical distribution, and I think it is very desirable to have the different sections of the country represented. After all, the Commissioners are merely human—I do not wish to be thought to be making an attack upon them when I say that—and almost all human beings are more or less affected by the very human preference for the localities to which they are attached, for the State which they represent, for the places where they were born, and so on. It would be very unnatural if they should not have preferences of that kind. Therefore, I think it is extremely important that there should be some distribution of the Commission, so that every portion of the country may be fairly represented on the board, either by judicial circuits or by such other arrangement by districts as we may make here. I have no doubt, as the Senator from South Carolina says, we can make much better ones than those which now exist in the judicial circuits.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I merely want to suggest to the Senator, by way of letting his mind rest on that view in that connection, whether or not he regards this Commission as approximating in dignity and power and responsibility the Supreme Court?

Mr. LODGE. I think, Mr. President, that it has enormous power, but I do not think that it approximates in dignity or in weight to the Supreme Court, nor do I believe it can ever do so, for the very reasons which I have already suggested. It has neither the traditions nor the habits of a court, nor is it one of the great constitutional departments of the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. With that I agree in some measure, but the responsibility which rests upon this Commission, or will rest upon it if we legislate along the lines we are contemplating, and the power it will have will be so great that I would regard it as the nearest in dignity and power to the Supreme Court of any department of the Government not mentioned in the Constitution. Of course, I probably ought to except the Senate and House of Representatives, which will create and govern that body; but, holding the view that I do, that this Commission is to be a body of great responsibility and power, with very large salary, and everything to lift it as far above partisanship and sectionalism as is possible, I would deprecate anything which would look like a recognition of sectionalism in its composition, if we can possibly get rid of it.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator from South Carolina think it would be a good idea to have all three Commissioners from the State of New York, for example?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, I should think it would be a good plan for the President to consider most carefully and seriously the make-up and antecedents of any man whom he might suggest to us for appointment on the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I can not resist the temptation, unless the Senator from Massachusetts objects to my interrupting him here, to say that I am in accord with the suggestion just now made by the Senator from South Carolina, that men should not be selected for this Commission, if we are to have one, representing the different sections. I say that, not alone upon argument, to which I have not time to resort, but rather upon experience. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Massachusetts is familiar with the Maximum Rate case, so called.

Mr. LODGE. I have read it.

Mr. FORAKER. We have, in the decision rendered in that case, an illustration of what the representation of sections will do, without anybody intending to do anything except only his full duty.

That was a case, as Senators will remember, in which the question before the Commission was whether the rates from Chicago and Cincinnati to Chattanooga, Atlanta, Rome, Meridian, Knoxville, and other places in that territory were relatively too high. The Commission found that they were. They ordered a reduction. I will go into this at length when I have the time. I merely want now to give the Senator the benefit of what is in my mind, if it shall be of any benefit.

The opinion was prepared by Mr. Clements, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who resided at Rome, Ga. Now, Rome and Atlanta were common points. The rate from Cincinnati, for instance, to Atlanta and Rome was $1.07. It was the same to both points. The rate was the same from Chicago to both Atlanta and Rome. They were common points. But they so worked it out, honestly, of course, Mr. President—I do not mean to reflect at all on Mr. Clements, who wrote the opinion——

Mr. LODGE. I trust the Senator from Ohio is not going to read the opinion.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not going to read the opinion, but I am going to state the result.

What was the result? To make it short, the Commission agreed—Mr. Clements wrote the opinion—that the rates were too high from Cincinnati and Chicago to Rome and Atlanta and these other points, and they made a reduction. They reduced the rate, on an average, 19 per cent to all points except Rome, and reduced the rates to Rome nearly 29 per cent. In other words, the rate from Cincinnati to Rome and Atlanta was $1.07. They reduced the rate from Cincinnati to Rome to 75 cents and to Atlanta to 86 cents. They worked that out according to a rule which they adopted. But it shows, whether consciously or not, that Mr. Clements was there, representing his section, determined to see that it had a square deal, and to give it a square deal. Rome, not the Rome that sat on her seven hills and from her throne of beauty ruled the earth, but Rome, sequestered in the foothills of northern Georgia, a common point with Atlanta, was given this greater reduction.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts will permit me——

Mr. FORAKER. Now, I want to say—and then I will not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts further unless I feel inclined to and he will allow me—that the vice of this whole business is the idea that the different sections have got to be represented, the different professions have got to be represented, the different political parties have got to be represented. What have parties and what have sections to do with the efficient discharge of this duty?

Mr. President, I shall contend at the proper time that if you are going to have a rate-making commission it shall be composed of three men, all of whom shall live in Washington, or some other place from which men can be chosen who are supposed to have no prejudices, no biases, no sections to represent, and who will be fair and honest toward all the interests involved.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me for just a moment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indulge me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has not yielded.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to reply to the Senator from Ohio before I yield to others.

The argument of the Senator from Ohio is mine. I think it leads directly to what I am advocating, because I do not believe we can find in this country three men or five men or nine men who are wholly devoid of local feeling and prejudice. I repeat, I think these gentlemen on the Interstate Commerce Commission are merely human, and the example of Rome, Ga., is a perfect example of exactly what I want to avoid by giving a representation to each section, so that there will be no possibility of favoritism to one town or one section over another, because the Commissioners will be able to balance each other and see that one section is not punished and another unduly benefited. I draw a different conclusion from the example which the Senator from Ohio has cited. It seems to me to argue my case and not his.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator indulge me a moment before he resumes his argument? I dislike to interrupt him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely want to say that while I am in no sense a defender of Mr. Clements, I should like to know a little more in regard to this alleged favoritism to Rome.

Mr. LODGE. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would not discuss Mr. Clements and his favoritism in the middle of my speech. He can do it just as well later on.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator can strike out everything I say after I get through.

Mr. LODGE. That is a detail which we can take up subsequently.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think when Mr. Clements has been attacked, as I think probably unfairly, or——

Mr. FORAKER. I expressly stated that I was not making any attack upon Mr. Clements.

Mr. LODGE. I must proceed, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I must surrender, if the Senator from Massachusetts will not permit me to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is desirable to make this board, so far——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do hope the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to say a word for Mr. Clements right in this connection. He has been assaulted here, and a very grave reflection has been made upon him. Certainly I will not occupy much of the time. I just want to say this——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I have made no reflection whatever upon Mr. Clements.

Mr. BACON. I know; but the Senator yielded to the Senator from Ohio, who did, and I think in the same connection——

Mr. LODGE. I had no idea what the Senator from Ohio was going to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I simply want to say a word.

Mr. LODGE. I yield, certainly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into the discussion of the question as to the propriety of the ruling which was made. I have known Mr. Clements for a long time, and am perfectly certain that when the facts are ascertained there will be such an explanation of them as will relieve him absolutely of such reflection as that cast upon him by what has been said by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will permit me for a moment. If the Senator from Ohio had simply sought to apply what has been done by the Commission to the contention that Mr. Clements naturally favored the section from which he came, that might have been so in accordance with what is human nature that no reply would have been needed. But the idea of suggesting that Mr. Clements, coming from Rome, was a party to the deliberate and intentional discrimination between Rome and Atlanta is utterly beyond all reason or possibility of correct foundation in fact or reason.

Mr. Clements has been a member of the Commission for fourteen years, and in all that period this is the first thing I have ever heard which in the least reflects upon him as a man finely fitted for his position, devoted to his duties, diligent, capable, honest, and impartial; and I am sure that an examination of his record will prove that I have in no manner overstated the estimate in which he is held, and is entitled to be held, by the public.

I think, so far as Atlanta and Rome are concerned, if the Senator from Ohio knew how big a place Atlanta is he would not for a moment suggest that anybody in the State of Georgia would discriminate against Atlanta in favor of any other locality, even if he lived in the latter.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I fully subscribe to all that the Senator from Georgia has said in favor of Mr. Clements. I know Mr. Clements and I have a high regard for him, and I was particular to say that Mr. Clements in making this decision acted honestly and in accordance with the rule which he and the Commission had adopted, but which worked out this particular result.

But nevertheless the fact remains, as the result of what they did, that Rome did get this exceptional benefit, which does look like a discrimination, and which was regarded as a discrimination by all the interested cities at the time the order was made.

Mr. BACON. But if it was the unanimous act of the Commission, how can it be that it was influenced by the fact that Mr. Clements lived in Rome? It seems to me that defeats the entire contention of the Senator, unless he means to say that Mr. Clements's influence over the Commission was so great that he could secure from them a unanimous ruling in favor of the small town of Rome.

Mr. FORAKER. I mentioned that simply as a coincidence——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I must decline to yield any further to a discussion about Mr. Clements.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. LODGE. We have now heard from the complainant and from the defense, and I think the question may rest there.

Whether we can remove the Commission from undue geographical considerations or not, I think everybody will agree that it is in the highest degree desirable to put them as far away as possible from geographical considerations, and also whether we get the three archangels, whom the Senator from Ohio is going to have, living in Washington, or whether we get merely nine honest and able American citizens, I regard it as highly important to put them by their tenure and by their salary and by all the dignity we can confer upon the office as far beyond the effect of geographical considerations or public clamor as it is possible to place them.

We are all susceptible to public clamor as well as to local patriotism. That is a weakness of human nature. Senators will remember an illustration of it in Pickwick, when Mr. Pickwick and his friends went down to see the election at Eatanswill. When they arrived there was a mob in the street, which called upon them to cheer for Slumpkey. Under Mr. Pickwick's lead they all cheered for Slumpkey. "Who is Slumpkey," whispered Mr. Tupman. "Hush," said Mr. Pickwick; "I do not know, but I have observed that under these circumstances it is generally wise to do what the mob do." "But," said Mr. Snodgrass, "suppose there are two mobs?" "Shout with the larger," said Mr. Pickwick. Volumes could not have said more.

Mr. Pickwick, who was a very wise man, pointed out a common weakness of human nature. There is a tendency always to shout with the largest crowd. I wish to see the Commission raised as far as possible to a point where they will be not susceptible to public clamor, where they can decide these great questions with an eye single to the public good, and with an absolute regard for the rights of all who are involved.

I have also provided in this amendment that three of the Commissioners shall be lawyers. There have been forty-three cases taken up from the Commission to the Supreme Court. In thirty of these the Commission has been overruled; in only two affirmed. The cases that were not taken up were really more in the nature of arbitration. I think it would be desirable to have men to interpret the law under which they act who could make a little better percentage of affirmations in the Supreme Court when their cases were taken up for review.

The term of the Commissioners is made long by my amendment for the same reason that the salary is made high, in the hope of securing the very best men.

I have also proposed that three Commissioners shall be men who have had experience in railroad management and operation. It seems to me it is very desirable to have on the Commission men who know something about the practical operation of railroads. Mere hostility to railroads does not seem to me a sufficient qualification in itself for passing upon these great questions. I think we need more knowledge than that. In my opinion we require on the Commission a knowledge of law and good lawyers. I think that they also should have a knowledge of railroads. Let the other three members be simply laymen without special knowledge, if you please, or without special training either in law or railroads. In suggesting that the chairman of the Commission shall be a lawyer, I merely follow the English precedent, where the railway commission court has for its presiding officer one of the judges of the highest court, recognizing in that way the importance of great legal ability when it comes to the decision of these important questions.

Mr. President, I think it is a good rule, whenever Congress confers great powers, to guard them well, and I would guard them here, first, by the character and ability of the Commission, and then by assuring to all who come before the Commission their day in court afterwards if they are dissatisfied with the Commission's ruling.

In the speech which I made some little time ago on this same question I made no allusion to any local or sectional aspect which it might present. We in New England believe that the prosperity of one part of the country makes for the prosperity of all. We can not conceive that we should prosper while the rest of the country or any other important part of the country was suffering from adversity. At the same time to every section of this country the powers conferred on the Commission are a matter of great moment, and I desire, if I may so far trespass on the patience of the Senate, to point out the nature of the importance this bill possesses to that part of the country from which I come.

One of the railroad Commissioners, Mr. Prouty, has recently been making speeches in New England, and he made one speech in Boston in which he took occasion to point out how mistaken the attitude of the New England Senators and Representatives was in regard to this bill. I do not know that he was quite clear as to just what our position was, but he certainly thought we were making a mistake. His speech was widely read. It might, if unanswered, give a very false impression of the attitude of New England Senators and Representatives, and I do not think it states very fairly the condition of New England in relation to this question. There is no part of the country which so much requires proper regulation of railroads as New England, and there is no part of the country which would suffer more from a misuse or abuse of the powers conferred by this proposed act than the New England States.

Mr. Prouty in his Boston speech took occasion to point out how much better off New England would be if she only could have a railroad commission here in Washington, if not at home, vested with great powers; and in order to show our depressed and unfortunate condition he took as a standard of comparison the State of Iowa and the Kingdom of Prussia, or, rather, Germany. He wished to suggest how much better off we would be if we only had the laws of Iowa or the laws of Germany in regard to our railroads.

Mr. President, the comparison with Iowa is a severe one for Massachusetts or any one of the little New England States to encounter. Iowa is a great State of over 55,000 square miles. There is probably no spot in the world that has a richer soil. It is a beautiful State. It has great deposits of coal. It has enormous natural endowments. It is equally fortunate in the character of its population. There is no State in the Union with a finer or better population than that of the State of Iowa. There is no State which has been more strongly or powerfully represented in the National Government than the State of Iowa from the day when she first entered the Union. At this moment there are two representatives of that great State in the Cabinet. The leader of the Senate, honored and beloved by all Senators on both sides, is the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The name which this bill bears is that of a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives from the same State. No State is more fortunate in its natural gifts and in the ability and character of its people than that great State of Iowa, in the heart of the country.

As to Massachusetts, Mr. President, we are very proud of our old State; very proud of its great history, and of the men who have made that history. But it is a small State. It has only about 8,000 square miles. It has not a fertile soil. It has no mines. It is dependent on its sister States for all the materials which it works up into finished products in its many industries. Certainly, Mr. President, if the legislation of Massachusetts is bad, no State ought to show it so quickly or be so sensitive to it.

Yet, Mr. President, I turn for comparison in population to the census of 1905, which was taken during the past year in Massachusetts and also in Iowa, and I find, according to the statement furnished me by the Director of the Census, that the population of the State of Iowa, according to the State census of 1905, was 2,210,000, and in 1900, according to the returns of the Twelfth Census, it was 2,231,000, a loss in five years of 21,000. The population of Massachusetts, according to the census of 1900, was 2,805,000. The population in the past year was shown by the State census to be 3,003,000. The State of Massachusetts gained practically 200,000 people in the last five years, while the State of Iowa appears on the face of the census reports to have lost 21,000.

Mr. President, those figures, considering the enormous natural advantages of the State of Iowa, a great State, six times as large as the State of Massachusetts, certainly, I think, disprove the proposition of Mr. Prouty that we are suffering in Massachusetts from injurious or ineffective legislation or that we are in sore need of more and new legislation to save us from ruin. We have a railway commission in Massachusetts. We were one of the earliest States to adopt such a commission. It does not undertake to fix rates. It advises the rate to be made and trusts to publicity. Our law has been copied in England. It is a law praised by Mr. Acworth in his testimony as a model law on the subject of railroads, and under that law the State has suffered as little from railroad discrimination, I will venture to say, and has come less, I am sure, to the Interstate Commerce Commission for relief than almost any other State in the Union.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Massachusetts has called attention to the fact that Massachusetts has gone ahead while Iowa has retrograded in population during the past five years, notwithstanding the fact that the State of Iowa has great natural advantages and great natural wealth that Massachusetts does not have.

I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether that might not be attributed to the economic policy of the country, which, through a high tariff, has protected the special industries of Massachusetts unduly, building up wealth and population there; and also whether the financial control of the railroad systems of the country, largely centered in Massachusetts, New York, and States adjoining, has not resulted in such an adjustment of rates as to drain the wealth from the interior of the country to Massachusetts and adjoining States?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will not enter into a tariff discussion at this point. In regard to the railroad rates, Mr. Prouty's argument, made in Boston, was that New England would be a great deal better off if she could only have an interstate commerce commission with larger powers; that they would give her better rates than she has now. That was his whole argument as addressed to New England, and it was an abso-lately sectional appeal. He took his hearers up into a high mountain at the board of trade dinner and showed them all the glories he was going to confer upon them when these enlarged powers were placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He did not take the view of the Senator from Nevada, that Massachusetts has been making rates favorable to herself, and I never heard anybody suggest for a moment that such rates were made by the railroads.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there was some testimony by Mr. Tuttle, of the Boston and Maine system, before our committee, Mr. Tuttle being one of the most intelligent and capable railroad men in the country, showing that Massachusetts had a watchful eye regarding the rates throughout the entire country; and the rates were so adjusted through the control of different railway systems as to secure a market for Massachusetts products in far-distant States. Whether that adjustment was right or wrong, I do not pretend to say, but it is very evident throughout the testimony that through the great railway managers who control these great systems (and recollect that the financial control is all in a very small area—New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania) there is an organized system of so adjusting the rates as to advance these States of great population and wealth.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have failed signally in my attempt to convey my meaning to the Senator from Nevada. Mr. Prouty's argument in New England was that New England was suffering from undue discrimination, and he used as an argument that the rates in Iowa and the rates in Germany were a great deal lower than they were in New England. That is his argument. I leave the Senator from Nevada to discuss that with Mr. Prouty himself. What I want to show is that though the rates in New England are somewhat higher than they are in Iowa, Mr. Prouty did not have his facts quite correct, and that there is a good deal to be said by way of explanation.

In the first place, Mr. President, it was much more expensive to build the railroads of New England than to build the railroads in the West. It was an old, settled community. The land damages were very great and in a thousand ways the expenses of the railroads in New England far surpass those of roads in the newer parts of the country. For instance, this one single item will show what I mean. When the railroads began in Massachusetts and in New England generally they ran at grade crossings everywhere. The country was not then as thickly settled as it is now, but with the growth of population this condition became intolerable. We have therefore compelled the railroads to abolish those grade crossings, and in the last fifteen years the railroads have expended in Massachusetts $11,000,000 in abolishing grade crossings alone, having been forced to do it by acts of the legislature. Then, under our law we have no stock or bonds in any of our railroads which do not represent absolutely paid-up capital. There is no watered stock in the railroads. It has all been paid up under our corporation act. In order to earn even a very moderate dividend on these railroads it is absolutely necessary that the charges should be somewhat higher than in portions of the country where the original cost was very much less. It is also to be remembered that the Federal Government gave the Iowa railroads land of enormous value to assist them in the work of construction. A writer in the United States Investor for September 2, 1899, estimates that over 6,000,000 acres, about the area of the State of Massachusetts, was given by the Federal Government to the railroads of Iowa. In the same journal for November 25, 1899, Mr. W. W. Baldwin, the present assistant to the president of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, estimated that the grant was about 2,700,000 acres, or about half the area of Massachusetts. Of course in the old States there were no such aids to railroad building; there could not be in the nature of things.

Mr. Prouty takes as his principal standard of comparison the railroad haul from Boston to Newport, Vt., the town in which he lives, a small town near the Canadian line, I think. When he compares the railroad haul from Boston to Newport—250 miles—with the same distance in Iowa, it is almost as if one should compare an absolutely flat surface with the same distance measured up a mountain. In other words, the grades in Massachusetts have made the railroads very much more expensive. I have not been able to get any full information on the subject, but I believe that the grades in Iowa are practically nothing as compared with New England. For example, in going from Boston to Newport, Vt., over the White Mountain division, the train has to cross Warren Summit, where the altitude is 1,090 feet, thence it descends, and in going over the Passumpsic division it again reaches the altitude of 1,150 feet. It finally reaches Newport, which is at a level of 950 feet. If the freight trains should go over the Concord division they would have to go over Canaan Summit, which is 956 feet high, and then descending it must go over the Passumpsic division at the height of 1,150 feet. Such grades as these have added, of course, enormously, as I have just said, to the expense of the roads.

Without undertaking to discuss in detail all the intimations made by Mr. Prouty as to what the Commission would do in the way of reducing freight rates for the benefit of New England if it had the power, I was interested particularly by his suggestion that if this Interstate Commerce Commission secured its enlarged powers there ought to be a reduction of "millions of dollars" a year in the rates on coal consumed in New England. He explains that this reduction would not fall on the New England roads, but on the great coal-carrying roads of the country, mentioning the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, the Reading, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Norfolk and Western, and the Chesapeake and Ohio. Yet the Senator from Nevada a moment ago was pointing out to me that Massachusetts and New York control these railroads and were able to get low rates, and that is the reason why there was a prosperous and growing population. Here Mr. Prouty comes along and says that under a properly administered Interstate Commerce Commission there ought to be a saving of millions of dollars a year taken out of the coal roads outside of Massachusetts and New England. It is perfectly evident that if the charges of these roads on that proportion of their coal traffic destined for New England should be reduced proportionate reductions would have to be made on all their coal traffic, and if the reduction to New England alone should amount to millions of dollars, the total reduction would amount to many millions more. It will be remembered that when a delegation of railway employees called on the President and stated their objections to rate-making legislation he assured them that there would be no such reductions of rates as would affect their wages, and the advocates of this legislation have uniformly made light of the argument that it would endanger either the wages of employees or the incomes of the owners of railway securities. But if, according to Mr. Prouty, when they get new powers and begin to benefit New England by their rulings "millions of dollars" are to be cut off of the incomes of the roads on one item of traffic alone it must be apparent that this could not be carried very far without reducing wages and endangering dividends and interests on bonds.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, I call his attention in this connection to the fact that the only provision made in the Hepburn bill under which rates can be affected is a provision providing for the reduction of rates or the fixing of a maximum rate, which is generally regarded as a provision for reducing, because nobody expects the Commission to make rates higher. So there could not be any action taken by the Commission to relieve the people of the great burden that the Senator from South Carolina has so frequently referred to, except in the direction of reducing rates and reducing revenues, and thereby bringing about the result that the railroad men on the occasion mentioned were complaining of.

Mr. LODGE. These coal rates are one special grievance from which Mr. Prouty proposes to relieve New England, and he makes it appear that rates on coal to New England are higher than the coal rates either in Prussia or in Iowa. Assuming that the rates he cites are correct, I call attention to some testimony before the committee. Mr. H. S. Rand, president of the Burlington Lumber Company, in a letter to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce (pp. 3368 et seq., Report of Hearings), indicates that the Iowa coal rates are far from satisfactory to people doing business in Iowa. He says, on page 3371:

> Owing to the above, the Iowa rates on coal to Burlington are so high that our factories get their supply from Illinois.

He cites rates from Dunfermline, Ill., to Burlington, 88 miles, 85 cents per ton; from Peoria, Ill., 96 miles, 85 cents, and contrasts these with rates made by the Iowa commission from Avery, Iowa, to Burlington, 93 miles, 97 cents, and from Oskaloosa, Iowa, 105 miles, $1.01. In his testimony before the committee, on page 2194, Mr. Rand says:

> The principal reason why we do not have more manufacturing in Iowa is that it is more profitable to put your money into farming. Another reason is the inelasticity of our Iowa distance tariff.

Exactly what happened, if he is right, in every country in Europe where there are fixed Government rates—> and another reason is that when you want outside people to come in and go into manufacturing they always find this Iowa distance-tariff law, and they say: "If you are fools enough to make that kind of a law we will not live with you."

Mr. G. W. Trayer, engaged in coal mining in Illinois and Iowa, gave some interesting testimony (pp. 2224 et seq.) on the effect of Iowa rates on the coal business in that State. On page 2225 he said:

Instead of being manufactured at home with Iowa coal, Iowa corn and live stock are mainly sent out of the State, where Iowa coal can not naturally reach the manufacturer of them, or it is prevented in part by the same rate disabilities which sent the corn and live stock away. Missouri and Kansas coal go into Omaha on as favorable terms and relatively more favorable terms than Iowa coal does, and Missouri and Kansas coal go clear up to Sioux City on relatively more favorable terms. I am not speaking of absolute rates; I am speaking of relatively more favorable terms.

Mr. Murray Carleton, on page 2519, testified:

In Iowa, where rates are made by a State commission, the inelastic nature of the tariff, based only on distance, has driven practically everything except agriculture and mercantile business out of the State.

He quotes from the Des Moines Daily Capital of February 4, 1902, to show that the Iowa law is retarding the development of that State. Mr. E. T. Koch, traffic manager of T. M. Sinclair & Co., pork and beef packers at Cedar Rapids, Iowa (pp. 3320 et seq.), at the bottom of page 3323, said:

It is the railroads' arrangement of rates outside the State that makes it possible for the pork-packing industries within the State to thrive.

Then Mr. Prouty took up the cotton-manufacturing industry in New England, and intimated that New England was not treated fairly by the railroads, and suggesting that if the Hepburn bill should be passed the Commission would readjust the rates for the benefit of the cotton mills. The mills now have the advantage of water rates for their raw material, but their rates on finished goods are not so low relatively as Mr. Prouty thinks they should be, and he intimates that he would cut them to a level proportionately as far below first-class rates as the rates from southern mills are below first-class rates from southern points.

One of the points he made is that when they reduced rates from Atlanta to Chicago they reduced them more than they did the eastern rate, although by doing so the goods from Atlanta and Massachusetts came into Chicago on an equality. In this new propsition he would abandon considerations of distance, for the distance from Atlanta to Chicago is 275 miles shorter than the distance from New England. Notwithstanding this greater distance from the New England mills, he does not apparently believe that the southern roads should be permitted to make rates enabling southern cotton goods to compete in Chicago on equal terms with those of New England. They go in now on a parity, and he would have his audience believe that the Commission would interfere with the making of such rates as those on cotton goods from Atlanta when they are to the disadvantage of New England, but that when low rates are made to enable New England industries to compete on an equality in distant markets the Commission would not disturb the adjustment. He refers, for instance, to the rate on paper from Rumford Falls, Maine, to Chicago. He said:

That strikes me as an exceptional rate, made undoubtedly to enable the manufacturer at Rumford Falls to meet in the Chicago market the manufacturer of Wisconsin and Minnesota. Similar special rates exist in all parts of this country—

I am quoting from Mr. Prouty—

There is nothing in this proposed legislation which would in the slightest degree interfere with the maintenance of that rate or any corresponding rate.

It is a rate so low that he felt bound to call attention to it, but this statement as to the Rumford Falls rate can be reconciled with what Mr. Prouty said about the cotton-goods rates only on the assumption that his intimation that those rates would be reduced was merely meant to please his audience, or that he really believes—which I can not imagine—that the Commission would be influenced by sectional considerations and would interfere with rate adjustments enabling the South to compete on an equality with New England, but would not interfere with those enabling New England to compete on an equality with Wisconsin and Minnesota.

He also makes a suggestion in regard to boots and shoes, an enormous interest in New England, and especially in Massachusetts. It is hard to tell just what Mr. Prouty means in his reference to boots and shoes. He says he has a complaint that the classification is unjust. If he has, that is a matter which the Commission can deal with under the present law, for the United States court in Cincinnati, in the Proctor & Gamble case, recently sustained an order of the Commission changing the classification of soap in less than carload lots. If, then, there is a grievance and a complaint about boots and shoes in New England, as Mr. Prouty says there is, why does not his Commission remedy it now?

I will now give some detailed comparisons with rates in New England and Iowa in order to show how valueless comparisons are which are made on isolated examples.

No one denies that the average rates in New England are higher than in Iowa for the reasons I have already given as to the grades, cost of service, etc. If, however, one was to make comparisons, as Mr. Prouty does in his Boston speech, it is possible to make a very specious argument, taking the following samples of unusually low New England rates to show that because of the inefficiency of the Iowa State commission rates were very much higher than in New England. Eighty-five per cent of the railroad business in Iowa is through business, only 15 per cent being local. Taking New England, however, as one State about the size of Iowa, as Mr. Prouty did, it is a fact that about 80 per cent of the revenue of the Boston and Maine system would be local and only 20 per cent through traffic.

The following is a memorandum of low rates in force on the Boston and Maine Railroad, and if they stood alone and were used as Mr. Prouty used his examples, they would give an impression the reverse of that which he was seeking to convey:

Rate on crush stone, any distance over 100 miles and not over 150 miles, 75 cents per gross ton, carloads of 20 gross tons or more.

Rate on manure, any distance over 190 miles and not over 200 miles, 75 cents per 100 pounds, carloads of 30,000 pounds or more.

Rate on slab wood and edgings from Newport, Vt., to Boston, Mass., $18.24 for not exceeding 30,000 pounds. The distance from Newport, Vt., to Boston, Mass., is 250 miles.

Rate on iron pyrites, Charlemont, Mass., to Boston, Mass., 87½ cents per gross ton of 2,240 pounds, carloads of 20 gross tons or more; distance, Charlemont, Mass., to Boston, 127 miles.

Rate on sand-struck brick, Mechanicsville, N. Y., to Boston, Mass., $1.80 per thousand, weighing between 4,500 and 5,000 pounds per thousand brick; distance, Mechanicsville, N. Y., to Boston, 189 miles.

Rate on import clay, Boston, Mass., to Mechanicsville, N. Y., carloads of 30,000 pounds or more, 10 cents per 100 pounds, a distance of 189 miles.

Class rates from Rockland, Me., to Pittsburg, Pa., a distance of 955 miles are: cents, and from Brunswick, Me., to Palatine Bridge, N. Y., via Rotterdam Junction and the West Shore Railroad, class rates are:

1	2	3	4	5	6
50	43	33	24	20½	17

1	2	3	4	5	6

cents for a distance of 378 miles.

It is hardly fair to draw any comparison between the rates on agricultural products transported in New England with the rates charged on similar commodities shipped within the State limits of Iowa. On the main lines of the railroads in Iowa the freight trains will haul from 2,000 to 2,800 tons gross in one train, whereas on the different divisions of the Boston and Maine Railroad they can not haul to a train a greater average than 1,000 tons gross, excepting on the southern division, from Concord, N. H., to Boston, where they haul about 1,800 tons gross. Let me take now some of Mr. Prouty's examples and examine them from the New England standpoint.

The rate on potatoes, carloads, from Newport, Vt., to Boston is 17 cents per 100 pounds—not 19 cents, as stated by Mr. Prouty. This 17-cent rate extends as far north as Sherbrooke, Province of Quebec, a distance of 273 miles from Boston, and to Swanton, Vt., a distance of 286 miles from Boston. The rate from points in northern Aroostook County, Me., to Boston is 21 cents per 100 pounds, as stated by Mr. Prouty, but there is in force a rate of 26 cents per 100 pounds, all rail, to Pier 50, East River, New York, the distance being 636 miles. Rate of 29½ cents per 100 pounds, quoted by Mr. Prouty, applies to Thirty-third street, New York City, via Troy, N. Y., and the New York Central Railroad. The distance is 736 miles, and the higher rate is charged on account of the increased distance and the added terminal charges of the delivering railroad. The supply of potatoes for the Boston market comes principally from Aroostook County, Me., the shipments from Vermont being limited. Considerable quantities are shipped from points in New York. The rate from a point in New York 250 miles from Boston, the same distance as from Newport to Boston, is 17 cents per 100 pounds, the same as the Newport rate, but a rate of 18½ cents per 100 pounds extends across the State of New York as far as Buffalo, a distance of nearly 500 miles. The rate from Ogdensburg, N. Y., to Boston, not to be exceeded from intermediate stations on the Rutland Railroad, a distance of 393 miles, is 17 cents per 100 pounds.

The rate on hay—carloads—Newport, Vt., to Boston, is 17 cents per 100 pounds, as stated by Mr. Prouty. This same rate extends to Sherbrooke, Province of Quebec, and Swanton, Vt., and an 18-cent rate extends beyond Sherbrooke, as far as Levis, Province of Quebec, a distance of 416 miles from Boston. An 18-cent rate also extends as far west as Ogdensburg, N. Y., on the Rutland Railroad, 393 miles, and an 18½-cent rate as far west as Buffalo, about 500 miles. Very little hay is shipped from Newport and vicinity, it being a dairy country, and the hay is principally consumed on the farms. Last year there were shipped, all told, out of Newport, ten carloads of hay.

In establishing rates on such commodities as hay and potatoes, it is necessary, on account of commercial conditions, to have substantially the same rate cover a large area of territory, so that it would not be fair to cite a rate on hay and potatoes from a point like Newport, Vt., 250 miles from Boston, without considering the rates made from the entire territory from which the great bulk of the commodities is shipped. Mr. Prouty has explained the principle involved, in his reference to the milk case, in which he stated that beyond a distance of 190 miles the carriers might charge the same rate, no matter what the distance was.

It is true, as stated by Mr. Prouty, that the rate on lumber from Newport, Vt., to Hartford, Conn., a distance of 256 miles, is 15 cents per 100 pounds, but this same rate extends to Hoboken, N. J., via Rotterdam Junction, N. Y., and the West Shore Railroad, a distance of 450 miles; while a carload of lumber can be shipped from Newport to Pittsburg, Pa., a distance of 800 miles, at a rate of 17 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. Prouty stated that the carload rate on butter, Newport to Boston, was 46 cents per 100 pounds. No one ever shipped a carload of butter from Newport to Boston to any one consignee. Butter is shipped from several different shippers to several different parties, in less than carload lots, and the rate is 45 cents per 100 pounds. A special butter train is run weekly throughout the year. The butter is picked up in small lots at all points along the line of the Passumpsic division, reaching Boston ready for early morning delivery the following day. In the summer time refrigerator cars are furnished, and every possible attention is given to this important traffic. Considering the service performed and the fact that the shipments are never made in carload lots, the 45-cent rate appears to be a reasonable one.

Mr. Prouty also said:

It is possible that rates can be found which are lower for corresponding distances in New England than they are in either Iowa or Prussia. I know of none.

One of the great industries of Vermont is the granite business, considerable quantities of which are shipped from Mr. Prouty's home town—Newport, Vt. There is a rate in force on building stone, carloads, Newport to Albany, N. Y., of $1.26 per ton, divided among two railroads, and netting the Boston and Maine Railroad 96 cents per ton for its haul of 278 miles, from Newport to Troy, N. Y. This pays the Boston and Maine Railroad a rate of 3 mills per ton per mile. There is also a rate of 18 cents per 100 pounds on building stone, carloads, Newport to Chicago, Ill., via Sherbrooke, Province of Quebec, and Grand Trunk Railway, a distance of 981 miles, 3.67 mills per ton per mile; also a rate of 6 cents per 100 pounds on paving and curbing stone, carloads, Newport to Troy, N. Y., a distance of 278 miles, 4 mills per ton per mile; also a rate of 15 cents per 100 pounds on building stone, carloads, Newport to Pittsburg, Pa., a distance of 800 miles, 3.71 mills per ton per mile. Perhaps rates lower than three and four-tenths of a cent per ton per mile can be found in Iowa and Germany, but they certainly do not show themselves at once to the investigator in either case.

Now, let us look at Mr. Prouty's argument from the Iowa side so far as I have been able to get the figures. The rate on potatoes, let me say in passing, for 250 miles in Iowa is 13.05 cents instead of 12½ cents, as stated by Mr. Prouty. It is not fair, however, to draw any comparisons between rates on agricultural products applicable in the mountainous and rough New England States, where the cost of building railroads and operating railroads is very many times greater than in Iowa, and whose principal industry is manufacturing, with the rates applicable in the flat prairie State of Iowa, where on the main lines of our railroads freight trains of from 2,000 to 2,800 tons gross are hauled in one train, where there is practically no industry except agriculture, and where the entire traffic originating in the State is composed of farm products of one kind or another. It would be just as fair to compare the average yield of farm products per acre of the total acreage of the State of Vermont with the average yield per acre in Iowa.

On potatoes and hay the comparison seems to be very unfavorable to New England, but probably not more so than the relative tonnage and importance of the agricultural products to the entire tonnage moved in Iowa and in the New England States or the tonnage of these commodities raised in Iowa and in New England. Hay is one of the most important crops of that State. The principal market for Iowa hay is in the far South and East, where the mileage is very long, and the rates to these markets have to be on a very low basis to permit the marketing of hay at all. It is probable that the low rates made for long mileages over which hay is actually moved largely influenced the Commission in the low rates which they made on State business and on which very little hay is shipped, each section of Iowa producing all the hay required for local consumption.

Butter rates in Iowa are very low, as any butter moved in this State in carloads is not for consumption, but is for concentration, to be reshipped later to eastern cities, principally New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

On lumber carloads the New England rates compare very favorably with Iowa rates, taking into consideration the cost of construction and cost of operation of New England railroads.

Mr. Prouty states that there is now very little claim on the part of the Iowa railroads that these Iowa rates are too low. Yet the railroads refuse to accept on interstate business—which is naturally long-haul business which justifies the railroads in handling it at a lower rate per ton per mile than should in all fairness be charged on short-haul business—as their fair proportion, the rates fixed by the Commissioners, and in many instances their proportion of such interstate rates on the usually accepted bases of divisions gives them higher earnings than would the Commissioners' rates. This is recognized by connecting railroads not reaching Iowa and who do not demand of the Iowa lines that they accept for their earnings the State rates, nor do the railroads permit of the application on interstate traffic of the combination of rates on stations situated on the Iowa State line where such combinations would make a lower through rate on interstate traffic than that authorized in the regularly published interstate tariffs. The reason that the low rates of Iowa have not seriously embarrassed the railroads is that only a very small percentage of the traffic handled in this State is local within the State. About 85 per cent of the traffic is said to be interstate and consequently not affected by the Commissioners' rates. Furthermore and most important, these low rates have prevented the railroads from making any joint rates locally in the State of Iowa, on the ground that the Commissioners' rates are so unreasonably low that no railroad can afford to accept any less than these rates in the forming of joint through rates between points on two different railroads, and a rate from a point on one railroad to a point on another railroad is made by adding the rates to and from the junction point of the two lines, there being no joint rates or through rates applicable over the continuous mileage of two different railroads.

Let us apply the Iowa conditions to the less than carload shipments of copper wire, dynamos, etc., referred to by Mr. Prouty, and the rates would be as follows:

On copper wire, less than a carload, from Providence, R. I., of which Phillipsdale is practically a suburb, to Bradford, Vt., the rate would be on the Iowa basis as just described:

	Miles.	Cents.
Providence to Boston, via the N. Y., N. H. & H.	45	16.49
Boston to Bradford, Vt.	173	27.75
Through	218	44.24

Instead of 32.16 cents, as stated by Mr. Prouty.

On dynamos and transformers, less than carload, from Pittsfield, Mass., to Bradford, Vt., the rate would be:

	Miles.	Cents.
Pittsfield, Mass., to Springfield, Mass., via the Boston and Albany	52	20.4
Springfield, Mass., to Bradford, Vt.	247	48
Through	299	68.4

Instead of 54.4 cents, as stated by Mr. Prouty.

Carrying this principle still further, the rates from Newport, Vt., to New York, via the most direct lines, would be made as follows on the Iowa basis:

POTATOES (CARLOADS).

	Miles.	Cents.
Newport to Springfield, Mass., via Boston and Maine	324	16.5
Springfield to New York, via New York, New Haven and Hartford	136	8.8
Through	460	25.3

HAY (CARLOADS).

Newport to Springfield	324	14
Springfield to New York	136	7.36
Through	460	21.36

BUTTER (CARLOADS).

	Miles.	Cents.
Newport to Springfield	324	31.5
Springfield to New York	136	18.8
Through	460	50.3

LUMBER (CARLOADS).

	Miles.	Cents.
Newport to Springfield	324	11.13
Springfield to New York	136	7.18
Through	460	18.31

In the opposite direction:

FERTILIZER (CARLOADS).

	Miles.	Cents.
New York to Springfield	136	6.24
Springfield to Newport	324	12.50

SUGAR (CARLOADS).

	Miles.	Cents.
New York to Springfield	136	10.72
Through	460	32.22

I wish now to say a single word in regard to the comparison with Prussia. I have seen much discussion and have read a number of answers to Mr. Meyer's book, and I have seen extracts from the report of the Prussian commissioners to which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] referred when I spoke before, and I have not yet seen anything which meets the main point that I then made. They upset Mr. Meyer's proposition about milk rates into Berlin, a point to which I did not allude and which seemed to me of no great moment, but they do not touch the main argument which I ventured to offer when I discussed that question before.

In making any comparison with a European country let me say at the outset we overlook too much the fact that we are dealing with a huge system in this country, a system of 212,000 miles—more than all Europe—while all these systems of individual countries in Europe are little systems easily managed in comparison with ours. This fact ought always to be kept steadily in mind in this discussion of comparative rates.

I know of no publication in this country giving details as to Prussian rates by which Mr. Prouty's figures can be checked. I understand that the Commission sent a man abroad last summer and it is probable that these figures were obtained by him. In any event Mr. Prouty's use of the figures is such as to create the impression that Prussian rates are lower than those in New England or in Iowa. They seem to be so in the specific cases which he cites. Yet the fact remains that the average rate per ton per mile in Prussia is far above the average rate in the United States. Mr. Prouty does not think that comparison should be made on the ton-mile basis, but that basis seems to me to be the only one on which intelligent comparisons of average rates can be made. It is undoubtedly true that the average in America is brought down by the large volume of long-distance low-class traffic. Mr. Prouty would have us believe that the rates in Prussia are not similarly reduced by low-class traffic because that traffic in Prussia moves by water. I am satisfied from my own investigations that the reason is just the other way and that the low-class traffic in Germany goes by water because the railroad rates are high.

Mr. Prouty says that the fact that there are no express companies in Prussia has the effect of increasing the average ton-mile rate, as small packages are handled by rail on express time and at higher rates than are charged for ordinary service. He says nothing of the fact that the German Government operates a parcels-post service, carrying packages up to 110 pounds in weight (50 kilos) (see Pratt's Railways and their Rates), and that the great bulk of the business done by express companies in the United States is done by the parcels post in Germany, which is excluded from computation because it is government postal business, thus lowering the average returned rate. Moreover, if it is fair to direct attention to the fact that the average Prussian rate is increased by the higher charges for fast freight, it is equally fair to direct attention to the way in which the average rate in the United States is increased by fast-freight service in this country, such as the fruit and vegetable trains, that are moved on schedules faster than those of many passenger trains and on which the rate per ton per mile is far in excess of the average for the United States. Taking these things into consideration, the comparison based on rates per ton-mile is not unjust to Germany. As a matter of fact, German rates ought to be lower than those in the United States. Germany as a whole is a much more densely populated country and ought to have a much greater density of railroad traffic, and density of traffic is the most powerful factor in rate reduction. Another reason why rates should be lower in Germany than in the United States is that the wages of railway employees in Germany are much lower. The pay of employees on the railways of the United States makes up about two-thirds of the total cost of operation. On page 3126 of the Senate hearings Mr. Slason Thompson gives an unsatisfactory table of comparison of railway wages in the United States and other countries. The figures he gives for the United States are not an average for all employees, but are the average for "other trackmen," as given by the statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1903. This is the lowest-paid class of American railway labor, and the average for 1903 was $1.31. He gives the average German wage at 57 cents per day, but does not say what class of labor it represents. If Mr. Thompson's figures for Germany represent the lowest-paid class in that country, and the other classes are paid in about the same proportion, it would make the daily wage of a German railway engineer about $1.75 per day, against an average of $4.01 in the United States in 1903 and $4.10 in 1904. That the wages of a German engineer are probably below $1.75 would seem to be indicated by the fact that according to some figures published by the Bureau of Manufactures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, about the 1st of last September, the average wage of a locomotive engineer in England is $1.62 per day, and that of an engineer in Belgium $1.01. Mr. Thompson gave these same figures on page 3127 of the Senate committee hearings. The Fifteenth Annual Report of the Commissioner of Labor on Wages in Commercial Countries has some better data as to the daily wages of railway employees in Germany in 1898. The figures given for locomotive engineers range from $1.19 to $1.83 per day; for locomotive firemen, from 78 cents to $1.43, and for conductors, from 51 cents to $1.56 per day. The average wages of these same classes of employees in the United States in 1898 were: Locomotive engineers, $3.72 per day; firemen, $2.09, and conductors, $3.13. In 1904, the latest year for which statistics are published, these wages in the United States were: Locomotive engineers, $4.10; firemen, $2.35, and conductors, $3.50. These figures speak for themselves and require no comment.

Mr. Prouty further says that German passenger rates are lower than ours. How he reaches such a conclusion I can not imagine. I have traveled in Germany a good deal. I have made some investigations in these matters there out of curiosity. I did so last summer as to their passenger rates. Their passenger rates, as I found them, are much higher than ours. If Mr. Prouty reaches his conclusion by taking their third-class rate, which involves a car that no American would travel in, I can imagine that he might probably reduce their rates of passengers to a low rate; but even then I do not see how he can get it down lower than our passenger rates on the average, because ours are the lowest in the world, and our cars are incomparably better than the best German cars.

I have looked at Rolfe's Satchel Guide to Europe, 1905, which, according to the title page, is revised annually, and I find some German rates, with distances stated in miles. From Leipzig to Berlin, 101 miles, the rates are: Express, 15.40 and 11.80 marks; ordinary, 13.20, 9.90, and 7.20 marks. Counting the value of a mark at 23.8 cents, would make the first-class rate on express trains $3.6652, or about 3.66 cents per mile; second-class express, $2.8084, or about 2.80 cents per mile; first class on ordinary trains, $3.1416, or about 3.14 cents per mile; second class on ordinary trains, $2.3562, or about 2.35 cents per mile, and third class on ordinary trains, $1.7136, or about 1.71 cents per mile. For the year ended June 30, 1904, the average passenger rate in the United States was 2.006 cents per mile, which is far below any service of equal goodness anywhere in Europe. This rate has increased very slightly in recent years, owing to the effect of the trolley lines in taking off of the steam railways a considerable proportion of their short-distance traffic carried on commutation rates. The effect of the voluntary and compulsory reductions in passenger rates being made during the current year will, of course, have a decided effect on the average rate. You will note that in these Leipzig-Berlin rates not only the first-class, but the second-class rates as well, are above the average in the United States. As a sample of short-distance German rates, I find that from Berlin to Potsdam, 16 miles, with a first-class rate of 2.10; second class, 1.60, and third class, 1.05 marks; equivalent, respectively, to 49.98 cents, 38.08 cents, and 24.99 cents. These rates per mile would be about 3.12 cents, 2.38 cents, and 1.56 cents. Other rates given in this guide book would figure out about the same.

Mr. Slason Thompson, on page 3126 of the Senate hearings, under the head of foreign passenger rates, says:

Germany.—Fast trains: First class, 3.45 cents; second, 2.55; third, 1.79. Ordinary trains: First, 3.06 cents; second, 2.3; third, 1.53, and fourth, 0.77 (not allowed on fast trains); average receipts per passenger mile about 1.07 cents, due to 90 per cent of travel being third and fourth class on cars little better than American box cars.

I can not understand how Mr. Prouty makes the average Prussian passenger rate 9 mills per mile, unless he includes all classes and divides the total receipts by the number of passengers carried 1 mile, including all free passengers, which would include the large number of soldiers transported every year.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me a moment?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. As to the accommodations between Leipzig and Berlin, the rails and the cars that are run on them are perhaps the best they have in Germany. Is not that true?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and that is the reason why I took it for comparison.

Now, Mr. President, Mr. Prouty also took up the case of port differentials. The Senator from Ohio in that very great argument which he made the other day, in discussing the question of port differentials, pointed out that by their action on port differentials the Commission had the power to close the port of Boston to-morrow if they so pleased. They could indeed close every port in New England, and our seaboard is the one great natural gift that we have. I am not going to argue this point elaborately, for I have already taken much more time than I ought to have taken, and I will try to dispose of it in a few sentences.

Mr. Prouty's reference to port differentials raises the question of what might be expected if the Commission should undertake to fix export rates to the several ports under the Hepburn bill. Their action in making the recent arbitral award was entirely extra-official, and their award has no more force than that given it by the agreement of the commercial bodies to submit the controversy to arbitration and abide by the decision. If, however, they should undertake to fix port rates under the Hepburn bill, their action would be official, and the question would be brought up whether they would not be governed by the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the giving of any preference to the ports of one State over those of another by any regulation of commerce or revenue. If the courts should hold that the power to fix port rates was subject to this limitation, it is difficult to see how export rates to the ports could be made on any but a mileage basis. The short distance from Chicago to Boston is 1,001 miles; to New York, 912 miles; to Philadelphia, 822 miles, and to Baltimore, 801 miles. It is apparent, therefore, that mileage rates on export grain would not only give to Philadelphia and Baltimore increased advantages on the inland rates as compared with Boston, but would give to New York an advantage over Boston, while at present Boston and New York have equal rates.

As an example of the manner in which the Commission now deals with this vital question let me cite the following case: Export grain is carried from the West by lake vessels both to Buffalo, N. Y., and to Fairport, Ohio. Thence the grain is carried by rail from Buffalo to Boston over the New York Central and Boston and Maine lines, and from Fairport to Baltimore over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The distance from Fairport to Baltimore and from Buffalo to Boston happens to be the same—480 miles. There was absolutely no evidence introduced to show that there was any difference in the railroad cost of hauling grain from Fairport to Baltimore as compared with Buffalo to Boston, yet the Commission ruled that all grain carried from Buffalo to Boston must take a rate of one-sixth of a cent per bushel higher on oats and barley and three-tenths of a cent per bushel higher on wheat, corn, and rye than between Fairport and Baltimore.

But I ask leave of the Senate to print some further facts in regard to the port differentials which I have here, an extract from one of the Boston newspapers.

The paper is as follows:

ATTACKS FACTS CITED BY PROUTY—"MERCHANT" DOUBTS THE INTERSTATE COMMISSIONER'S SINCERITY IN RAISING THE CASE OF IOWA FOR COMPARISON.

To the Editor of The Herald:

While to the casual reader the address delivered by Mr. Prouty, the Interstate Commerce Commissioner, before the State Board of Trade yesterday may seem a powerful argument in favor of greater control on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission of railroad rates, yet a critical examination will show the absurdity of some of the statements put forth by Mr. Prouty.

He evidently desires the people of Massachusetts to believe that if increased power is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission rates in Massachusetts generally will be lowered, the implication being that railroad rates are now higher here than they should be. He cites the case of Iowa, and compares it with Massachusetts and other New England States, claiming that the rates in Iowa are lower than in Massachusetts because Iowa has a railroad commission having powers similar to those now desired by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is almost impossible to credit Mr. Prouty with sincerity in advancing such an argument.

In the first place, the advisory decisions of the Massachusetts railroad commission are as effective as the decrees of the Iowa State commission, or any other State commission.

Secondly, Iowa can not properly be compared with Massachusetts. Iowa is an agricultural State, relatively speaking, it has very few manufactures. Its great products are corn, cattle, and hogs. To compare its fertile prairies with the rocky soil of New England and claim that rates should be as low in Massachusetts, with its unproductive soil, heavy grades, expensive tunnels, and high cost of fuel, is simply disingenuous.

The railroad mileage in Iowa is over 9,000 miles; in Massachusetts, 2,000. Iowa has 41 miles of railroad to every 10,000 inhabitants; Massachusetts has only 7 miles. On the other hand, the Massachusetts railroads are taxed $1,400 per mile of line, while the Iowa railroads are taxed only $200 per mile. Iowa has an ample supply of domestic coal; Massachusetts has none.

If Mr. Prouty will read the testimony recently taken before the Senate committee at Washington he will find that witness after witness testified that rates in the State of Iowa were inelastic, owing to the decisions of the State commission; that its railroads universally charged the full maximum rates, and that as a result Iowa has no large cities, its manufacturers have not increased, it has no large jobbing houses, and seems destined to remain forever an agricultural State—practically because of the fact that its local railroad charges are fixed by the commission.

Furthermore, if the rates in Massachusetts and Iowa were to depend solely upon cost of railroad transportation, it is clear that rates much higher than those of Iowa would be justified on the ground of extra expense.

In speaking of the recent controversy as to port differentials between the Atlantic seaports, Mr. Prouty again misstates the position of Boston. He said:

"Boston claimed that we should take away the entire advantage of Baltimore upon the land and should compel it to bear the entire burden of its disadvantage upon the ocean."

The above statement is not true. Boston claimed that the through rates from the West to Europe should be the same, whether the merchandise went on board the steamer at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. The Commission decided that for years the through rates by way of Baltimore and Philadelphia had been lower than through Boston, and that Philadelphia and Baltimore had a right to a lower through rate. Boston claimed, furthermore, that if the Commission decided to give Baltimore and Philadelphia a differential against New York, logic should compel it to give the same differential to Boston, which claim the Commission refused to concede.

Boston showed conclusively that steamship rates were little, if any, higher at the southern ports than at Boston; that the cost of handling cargo was much higher at Boston than at the southern ports, and that if there were any steamship advantages at Boston over the southern ports they were more than compensated by the shorter land haul to said latter ports.

The Commission decided, largely on the ground of distance, that the southern roads should have lower railroad rates on this export traffic than Boston, entirely ignoring the fact that on the through distance from the West, for example, to Liverpool Boston is over 200 miles shorter, at least a day's sailing on an average freight steamer.

The remarks by Mr. Prouty show an amount of misinformation almost appalling.

MERCHANT.

Mr. LODGE. Also, Mr. President, to show how much this law involves and why it means so much to our people, I wish to introduce a few statistics in regard to the port of Boston, which is to be put absolutely at the mercy of this Interstate Commerce Commission, and then ask if it is unreasonable that we should desire provisions which would protect us, in common with the rest of this country, so far as possible against injudicious or hasty action, and let it be remembered that what we ask for ourselves is just as important to every other corner in the country and every other State, great or small.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, Boston was the second port in the country, with aggregate receipts of $24,369,384.72. For the seven months ending February 1, 1906, Boston was again the second port in the country, with aggregate receipts of $16,236,365.76. I will ask leave to print these and some additional figures in my speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The figures referred to are as follows:

New Orleans	3,414,656.99
San Francisco	4,371,437.31

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is within the power of those who administer this law, it is within the power of any Executive who appoints these Commissioners, and of the Commission itself, to make or unmake the fortunes of any portion of the country.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Commission made a rate per ton per mile, would it not, in the Senator's judgment, ruin the coal interests of my own State of West Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; beyond doubt.

Every State is vulnerable; but there is no part of the country that is so vulnerable as New England, New York, and New Jersey. New England has her seaboard, with some forests in Maine, and a few granite quarries, and then you come pretty much to an end of her economic possessions which can not be taken from her. New York has her marvelous port, which nothing can take from her, and she has her highway to the Lakes; but we in the East have no mines, we have no indefinite tracts of fertile soil, we have no coal, and we have no iron. We must go to the States of the South to get our cotton; we must go to the Middle States to get our iron and our coal; we must go to the West to get our leather and our food stuffs; we must bring into New England everything that we manufacture, and our manufactures constitute the wealth of those six States.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he ever made a calculation to ascertain how much cotton he would get for the cotton mills of New England if the rates were fixed upon a mileage basis or anything approximating that?

Mr. LODGE. Why, Mr. President, if rates were fixed upon a mileage basis, every manufacturing industry in New England would go out of existence; it would turn it all into a desert. If you should, in addition, abolish differentials, you would send the entire exports of the country to New York chiefly and, in a smaller degree, Boston; you would have in New England one great city, Boston, and behind it nothing. We have now a uniform rate stretching—I take this as an illustration, of course it would go further, but I take simply the New England territory—we have a uniform rate from North Adams, a town on the western border of my State, to Waterville in Maine. The whole intervening territory between, north and south of that line and 300 miles in width, is filled with industries giving life and support to thousands of human beings. But force upon them a mileage rate, fix a distance rate, and you drive every industry back to the North Adams line.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is there any proposition in this bill to make a distance mileage rate?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; none absolutely requiring a distance rate.

Mr. NELSON. Then what is the use of discussing it?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can discuss this subject in any manner I feel inclined to; and one way of discussing it is to point out what an enormous stake my section of the country and your section of the country, Mr. President, have in it. I am trying now to show the enormous possibilities for evil as well as for good which are contained in this bill. I want this legislation, and am just as anxious for it as the Senator from Minnesota. There is no part of the country which needs proper railroad regulation and supervision more than New England, and there is none which needs to have that legislation better guarded than New England, New York, and New Jersey.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to ask the Senator, or any Senator who can give the information, whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission, when it has undertaken to fix rates, has ever undertaken to fix rates except either upon the mileage basis or what approximated to a mileage basis. Did they ever do it, or is it possible to do it?

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what, in his opinion, would be the effect of a mileage rate applied to the citrus and other fruits of California?

Mr. LODGE. I think the result will be that you will have to sell them all in the Philippines. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will allow me, I will give the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] a bit of information on that point. I am in receipt of a letter from Milford, Del., making bitter complaint that the citrus-fruit growers of California are allowed the same rates to New York as they are charged in Delaware. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my point is not to charge anything against the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am trying to argue simply the importance of having a commission worthy to undertake this work and, further, the necessity of guarding it by a proper access to the courts, but this speech about New England was made by an Interstate Commerce Commissioner in my own State and my own city, and I wish to reply to it. I wish to show why we are so very anxious to have this bill, when it passes, a safe as well as an effective bill.

I was describing when I was interrupted the conditions of New England, her natural endowments, and those of New York and New Jersey, for they are practically in the same class, in order to point out that we were peculiarly vulnerable, because our prosperity rests upon our experience, our traditions, our invested capital, and on our organization of workingmen and of industry. With unjust treatment all these conditions can be easily broken down and disappear.

In order to demonstrate what I have just said I desire now to call attention to some of the interests of New England and to show how dependent we are upon railroad rates. I saw it stated the other day in some newspaper that the New England Senators were dominated by the special interests of New England, by the manufacturing and the railroad interests. Why, Mr. President, in the manufacturing industries of my State alone there are, according to the census of 1900, 500,000 people engaged. To-day in the railroads of the State, little State as it is, there are 60,156 people engaged. In other words, there are from a million and a half to two millions of the population of Massachusetts absolutely dependent on the well-being of the industries and the railroads of the State, and if I am not to represent the interests of those people, whose interests am I sent here to represent? I may be very easily mistaken in my view of this bill, but certainly the only influence which guides me is my desire to protect and guard the interests which give my State life and prosperity and which furnish income and employment to the people who live within its borders. That is the only motive that influences any Senator from New England or from any State in the Union.

Mr. President, I now wish to call attention very briefly to a few figures which I have put down here simply to show how important this matter of railroad rates is to us. Mr. Prouty thinks we are not fairly treated now. That may or may not be the case, but what we want is that the Government regulations shall be guarded and shall be safe.

The area of Massachusetts is 8,040 square miles. Her population to-day is 3,003,680, with a density of population of 348.9 to the square mile. The gross value of her agricultural products is $42,298,274, or $15 per capita. The gross value of her manufactured products is $1,035,198,989, or $369 per capita. Her agricultural and manufactured products together amount to $384 per capita.

Let me quote at this point the following extract from the inaugural message of Governor Guild, of Massachusetts:

> Of all the States and Territories on this continent only four contain a smaller area. Because of geographical limitation, as well as from a notable lack of mineral deposits, forests, and rich arable soil, a slow rate of gain in material prosperity might logically be expected of Massachusetts in comparison with many States possessing greater natural advantages. Yet, on the contrary, at the last taking of our national census it was found that Massachusetts, fifth from the foot in area, is seventh from the top in population, fifth from the top in the annual value of her manufactures, and third from the top in the annual amount paid in wages. Measured by assessed valuation of the property in her borders, Massachusetts is exceeded by but two States. Fifth from the foot in area, Massachusetts is third from the top in wealth.
> Our Massachusetts census, just taken, tells a wonderful story. Immigration does not swarm to hopeless fields. In the decade between 1895 and 1905 Massachusetts added over half a million to her population. It is extraordinary that this great increase, which is, within less than fifty thousand, the same increase that was shown between 1885 and 1895, should have been possible in what was and is, with one exception, the most densely populated State in the Union.
> It is more extraordinary that this half million of increase, largely immigrants, should be not merely vast in proportion to area, but, with four exceptions only, larger in actual numbers than the increase shown by any other State or Territory in the whole United States.
> The annual value of the manufactured products of Massachusetts increased by but $175,173,033 between 1885 and 1895. It increased by $300,267,558 between 1895 and 1905. The total value of goods made in Massachusetts was $1,150,074,860 in 1905.
> The increase in the value of the annual product of cotton goods from 1885 to 1895 was $32,190,463. From 1895 to 1905, in spite of southern competition, it was $38,949,280. The increase in our wool and worsted products between 1885 and 1895 was $7,400,533. Between 1895 and 1905 it was $50,581,514. The increase in our shoe product between 1885 and 1895 was $7,405,548. Between 1895 and 1905 it was $70,271,966.

On October 31 the total amount on deposit in our savings banks was, in 1885, $274,998,412; in 1895, $439,269,861, and in 1905, $662,808,312. The increase in the last decade was greater by over $58,000,000 than in the decade that preceded it. In 1885 the average deposit for each person of population was $141.64; in 1895, $175.69, and in 1905, $220.67. The gain in deposits per capita in the last decade was greater by nearly a third than the gain in the preceding decade.

Massachusetts is the forty-first State in area in the United States; she is the thirty-first in agriculture; she is seventh in population; she is second in density of population, and she is fourth in manufactures. Among all the States in the Union in the capital invested in manufactures Massachusetts is third; in wages paid she is third, and in the number of wage-earners she is third.

New England has an area of 69,973 square miles; a population of 5,592,017. The gross value of her agricultural products is $169,523,435; the gross value of her manufactured products is $1,875,792,081, making a grand total of $2,045,315,516. Of all the capital invested in the United States New England represents almost 20 per cent, and with the Middle States 60 per cent.

Among all the States and Territories of the Union, Massachusetts is—

In textiles first, with $212,000,000 (Pennsylvania second, with $160,000,000).

In cotton goods first, with $110,000,000 (South Carolina second with $30,000,000).

In woolen goods first, with $73,000,000 (Pennsylvania second with $49,000,000).

In boots and shoes first, with $117,000,000 (New York second, with $25,000,000. Total for whole United States, $261,000,000).

In paper and wood pulp second, with $22,000,000 (New York first, with $26,000,000).

In proportion of wage-earners to total population:

	Per cent.
Rhode Island first	21
Connecticut second	19½
Massachusetts third	18
New Hampshire fourth	17
New Jersey fifth	13
Delaware sixth	12
New York seventh	12
Pennsylvania eighth	12
Maine ninth	11
Vermont twelfth	8½

Mr. President, on the industries which those figures indicate there are a great many people dependent for life, for existence, for their daily wage, for their homes.

Let me call attention to another point. Nothing is more common here than to describe with noble indignation the half-dozen men in New York who get together and make the rates, as if all we had to do was to break their power, and as if that was all that was involved. I desire, Mr. President, simply to call attention to the misleading character of such statements, and I take the figures from my own State as an example.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts in its sinking funds, established for paying the outstanding indebtedness of the State, holds Fitchburg Railroad bonds for $5,000,000; Boston and Maine Railroad bonds, $5,000,000. The amount of railroad securities held by our Massachusetts savings banks and trust companies is $152,551,438.08. The total amount of deposits in the Massachusetts savings banks on October 31, 1905, was $662,808,312, divided among 1,829,487 open accounts. (See p. 5, Savings Bank Report.) Under the law no account can be over $1,000, and the average of such accounts deposited is $362.29. In those institutions, under a carefully guarded law, of those savings of our working people, $662,808,312, in all there is $152,000,000 invested in railroad securities of different kinds. The total amount of stock of Massachusetts railroads held in Massachusetts is $129,055,425, divided among 36,201 Massachusetts holders. These figures were furnished by the accountant of the railroad commissioners of this State as of June 30, 1905, and their report gives a good statement of the railroad situation in Massachusetts. This makes an aggregate of $291,606,863 of railroad securities held in Massachusetts, exclusive of bonds held by life and fire insurance companies and national banks.

Mr. President, in this great measure we are dealing with the fortunes of all those people, and this law is capable of bringing them to ruin or of maintaining them in prosperity. Is it any wonder that we, their representatives, should be anxious about it? We have not in New England, as I have said, great natural endowments, the mere possession of which gives wealth. Whatever we have there we have worked for hard. We ask for no discriminations in our favor. We ask merely for the equality of treatment that every portion of the Union ought to have. But what we possess is perhaps to a greater extent than is true of any other portion of the country the result of more than two centuries of unremitting toil.

Inde durum genus sumus experiensque laborum.

Naturally in that dense population, dependent almost entirely on manufacturing industry, there is great anxiety as to the passage and the terms of this great bill.

Mr. President, I repeat what I said at the beginning, that, with these great interests, New England desires a good railroad-rate bill. She desires, in my judgment, proper railroad regulation and supervision, and she desires the Commission to be made up of the highest ability and best men we can get. I am sure that the Senators from New England represent her when they say that access to the courts should be preserved; that every man in this country is entitled to his day in court.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], toward the close of his very able argument on Monday last, said that to create distrust in the courts was to do the country irreparable injury, but that it was an even greater injury to teach a debasing belief in the infallibility of the courts. With that proposition I am in full accord. A debasing belief in the infallibility of any human institution or in human beings clothed with any function is a peril of the most serious kind, but I do not think that this point is a practical one. It does not seem to me that we are in any danger at this moment from too great belief in any man or too great reverence for any institution. On the other hand, I think that there is a very great danger, indeed, of the creation of that distrust of our institutions of government which the Senator from Texas spoke of as an irreparable injury to the country.

It is the fashion at this moment in certain quarters to indulge in furious attacks, and with utter disregard of truth, not only upon all our institutions of government, but upon our character as a people and the conduct of both our public and our private affairs. Concocting slanders and heaping together falsehoods for the purpose of selling them is not a pleasing trade, and when carried on in the name of virtue and reform it is a peculiarly repulsive one. To seek in this way to gratify that envy which is, unfortunately, not uncommon in human nature, or thus to take advantage for hire and salary of popular passions or of righteous popular indignation at proved wrong-doing, is a miserable calling and morally on a very low level. Slander and misrepresentation directed against individuals are not of much importance. If a man, whether engaged in public or private business, is not able by his character and his honesty to withstand such assaults, he is of little worth. As Doctor Johnson wisely said, "No man was ever written down except by himself." Men, moreover, are evanescent. Slanderer and slandered soon fade away and disappear. "We strut and fret our hour upon the stage, and then are heard no more." But wise institutions and free systems of government, painfully wrought, tried in the fires of sacrifice and suffering, should endure, for if they fall, they bring countless miseries in their ruin.

The real evil of all this sorry business lies in the creation of that distrust of our institutions to which the Senator from Texas referred. Yet the most serious quality of these attacks does not reside in those directed against the Senate. Every branch of the executive and legislative departments of the Government has been at one time or another in our history subjected to these indiscriminate assaults. No President was ever so maligned as Lincoln, and I have lived to see his fame rise up as world-wide as it is pure and unsullied, unharmed by the abuse of the forgotten creatures who thought to blacken his character and thwart his purposes. Within my own brief experience I have seen the House held up to public scorn and its Speaker denounced with unbridled ferocity on account of reforms which all men and all parties accept to-day, and which rescued that great body from a condition of inanition and contempt.

At this moment it is the turn of the Senate of the United States. The Senate has been assailed as virulently before when it has undertaken to perform the duties for which the Constitution designed it. Checks and balances in government are rarely popular, and the brake which is essential to preserve the train from accident or destruction not unfrequently jars some people's nerves when it is applied. But President and House and Senate all have one great security—they can ask the popular verdict, they can take the judgment of the people after the sober second thought, and they can plead their own cause before the great popular tribunal. Thus they have come through many trials, and they will have no difficulty in securing justice now as before.

But the case is widely different with the courts. They can make no popular appeal; they can enter upon no defense; they can secure no verdict at the ballot box. They must do their duty in silence, and trust to the slow processes of time to vindicate them. For this reason it has been an unwritten law of our politics—a law rarely infringed—not to assail the courts. It is no debasing belief, no superstitious reverence, which has dictated this custom. No one thinks for a moment that the courts are infallible. There have been in our history some bad judges, happily very few, to our honor be it said; there have been, and there are, many of only moderate capacity; but the courts of the United States as a whole, and the Supreme Court above all, irreproachable in character and of high ability, have been one of the finest achievements and one of the great glories of our American system of government. No greater harm could be done, no more malignant evil could be wrought, than to breed popular distrust in the administration of justice.

I cut from a newspaper the other day an interview with Mr. Debs. It appears that there are some men in the far West suspected, apparently on good prima facie grounds of complicity in a brutal assassination. Mr. Debs objects to their being tried at all. His language is:

> We have no courts to appeal to; they belong to the plutocracy, and I am opposed to spending our means going up against a brace game judiciary.

His remedy is civil war. You may say that is the raving of a man of violence and of anarchy. Perhaps it is the last extreme; but is it wise for others to encourage that wholly false view of the courts and to teach the American people that the courts are not to be trusted?

I took from the Chicago Record-Herald of December 31, 1904, the following interview with Mr. Prouty, a distinguished, energetic, and able member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He said:

> "If the Interstate Commerce Commission were worth buying, the railroads would try to buy it. They have bought pretty nearly everything in this country that is worth buying, and the only reason they have not tried to purchase the Commission is that this body is valueless in its ability to correct railroad abuses."
> This statement was made by Interstate Commerce Commissioner Charles A. Prouty yesterday in a discussion of legalized pooling. Asked, in view of this statement, whether it would be wise to give a commission control over rates, the Commissioner replied:
> "The public must trust some one, and that would be the best remedy it is possible to obtain under existing conditions. I am aware, however, that the great danger would lie in the possibility of the body to which should be intrusted the guardianship of the people's rights not performing its duty."
> Because of a possibility of purchase by the railroad interests, he was asked.
> "Yes; but not in the sense of an actual cash transaction. The railroads, it is well known, own many of our courts and other public bodies, but not because they have of necessity bought them by the expenditure of money. They have a different way of doing things. They see to it that the right men, the men of friendly inclinations, are elected. There would exist the danger of their doing this in the case of a 'strong' Commission, so that it might be composed of men who would sit idly by and do nothing of value."

Now, Mr. President, there is a man of high character, holding a high public position, deliberately stating to the people of this country that the courts and other public bodies are owned by the railroads. He says the railroads own them by electing them. United States judges are appointed. They are not elected. They are appointed by the President. The necessary implication is that if they are owned by the railroads the President has appointed men owned by the railroads.

If this were the utterance of some of our irresponsible magazine writers, whose only thought was to turn a penny by meeting what seemed a momentary demand for a sensational statement, it would be bad enough, but very far from fatal. Writers of that type come and go. They seize upon the excitement of the moment and presently rise like a flock of shore birds and whirl away to another spot where they think they can find a fresh feeding ground. These modern imitators of Titus Oates will pass away as he passed away. They will bring no innocent heads to the block as he did, although they may here and there cause distress. They will not end in the pillory as he did, because the pillory has been abolished, but they will go out of fashion just as he did into silence and contempt. It is when a man of ability and character holding high Government position like that of an Interstate Commerce Commissioner uses the language which I have quoted that the matter becomes deeply serious. It is when doubts and suspicions as to our courts are suggested by the words of men eminent in public office, as has been the case in the past months during the discussion of this question; it is when every effort is made to shut the courts out from all consideration of the momentous questions raised by this bill that the matter grows grave indeed, for it is in this way that the distrust is bred of which the Senator from Texas spoke and which every reflecting man must believe to be an inestimable if not an irreparable injury to the country. Congress should be the last place where any such attacks on the courts should be made—the last place where ideas of that sort could find a lodgment.

I have no superstitious reverence for the courts and no belief in their infallibility, but I look upon them not only as the bulwark of society and the guardians of liberty, but the symbols also of law and liberty. Where the decisions of the courts are obeyed, where justice is unimpeded, there are liberty and order, and there is no liberty without order. The oppression of the one tyrant is bad enough, but the oppression of a multitude of tyrants is infinitely worse. All Europe turned from the tyranny of the countless feudal lords and gave itself up to the tyranny of the one man who was made the king. It was far better than the tyranny of many. With disorder you may have license, you may have anarchy, but you will have no liberty. When you get to anarchy and disorder then you go over the dreary round, the old vicious circle, and land in the "reaction" and the "savior of society." We want neither socialism, which would reduce all things to a dead level and put all power into the hands of the Government, nor do we want anarchy, which represents chaos.

> We want men to be free,
> As much from mobs as kings; from you as me.

We want the sober freedom for which we have paid so great a price and which we have slowly and painfully built up and maintained. It is not that I apprehend these dangers from this specific bill, but I do apprehend grave dangers now lurking in the readiness to criticise the institutions of Government made by the hands of the people themselves and to slander the courts which administer our justice. Men are of slight importance. Let them say of us what they like and banish us forever if they choose—we men here—but it is the duty of every one of us to see to it that the great heritage of the past, which has given us freedom and everything we love and have fought for, is handed on untainted and unbroken to the generations which come after us. [Applause in the galleries.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BRICK, and Mr. MOON of Tennessee managers at the conference on the part of the House.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. The proposition to which the House has disagreed is one which was not represented by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who has just now addressed the Senate, and one with respect to which I fear he would not suggest conferees who would be agreeable to those of us who did represent that proposition. I rise, therefore, to object to the appointment of conferees in the usual way, and to ask that they may be selected by the Senate in such manner as may be proper for us to proceed in making the selection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will divide the motion, as, in his opinion, it is clearly divisible. The question is, Will the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House?

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the appointment of the conferees.

Mr. FORAKER. I move——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The remaining portion of the motion is now the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. FORAKER. I move as a substitute for that part of the Senator's motion that the conferees on the statehood bill on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the motion of the Senator from Indiana, so that the conferees shall be appointed by the Senate. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to suggest, if it met with the concurrence of the Senator from Indiana, that this matter go over until to-morrow morning, so as to give us an opportunity to confer with each other as to the conferees. It may be that we shall be able to agree upon the conferees. I do not know as to that. I have had no communication with the Senator from Indiana on the subject. But if he wants it disposed of now, I am willing that it shall be disposed of at this time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am willing to take any course that may be agreeable, although if it involves anything but the usual procedure, I think, perhaps, it might as well be disposed of now——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, we on this side of the Chamber can not hear.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Unless the Senator from Ohio is particularly insistent upon its going over.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not insistent upon its going over. I merely suggested that if it goes over until to-morrow, we will be able to take it up after consideration and after some conference.

Another reason for that is that if we go into this matter at this time, it is likely to create debate. I know there are some Senators who want to address the Senate on this subject. Other Senators have given notice that they desire to address the Senate at this time on other matters. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has been waiting throughout the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in order to secure an opportunity to address the Senate. I think, out of courtesy to him, it would be well enough to let the matter go over until to-morrow. Certainly no harm can arise from doing so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well, Mr. President. If the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to proceed now, and if this matter is likely to consume any time, I will let it go over until to-morrow morning.

In view, then, of that consideration and in view of the other suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, we will let it go over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion and the amendment will lie over until to-morrow.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I wish to present as an appendix, which has just come to us from the experts, some figures and facts relating to the Prussian railways. I send it to the desk and ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the papers sent to the desk by him be printed as a public document.

Mr. TILLMAN. The same number of copies as of the testimony.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. What is this?

Mr. TILLMAN. This is an appendix prepared by Messrs. Adams and Newcomb, under orders from the committee and under instruction from its chairman, sent to the committee and given to me by the chairman.

Mr. KEAN. And what both have agreed to?

Mr. TILLMAN. Both have agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it is embarrassing to ask the Senate to turn from the eloquent periods uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to what I am conscious will at best be an unsatisfactory discussion of what is purely a question of constitutional law, for I do not rise to discuss anything contained in the "rate bill," so called, save as to a single phrase in it.

Some days since the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], whose absence to-day I lament, not only because I am compelled without his presence to discuss a portion of the amendment which he has submitted, and to reply somewhat to the speech which he made upon it, but also for the sorrowful event which compels his absence, expressed the opinion that Congress may constitutionally incorporate in this bill, in connection with a provision for judicial review of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing rates, a clause prohibiting the circuit courts of the United States in such cases to restrain by injunction the enforcement of the order before final decree. This raises, obviously, a question of very grave import.

I entertain the profoundest respect and admiration for the Senator from Texas, not only for his great ability and learning as a lawyer, but for his high character, independence, and patriotism in the discharge of public duty. When I find myself differing from him upon a constitutional question which has received his attention it is with a distrust of my own opinion which leads me to a careful reexamination of the subject.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], in a very eloquent speech upon the pending measure, seemed to attach great significance to the words "or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction," in the clause relating to the time of taking effect of an order of the Commission fixing rates. To my mind these words are quite insignificant. They confer no jurisdiction upon any court of the United States not already possessed by it. They are mere recognition of existing jurisdiction, which can not constitutionally be withdrawn, and if they were stricken from the bill they would not in anywise affect the power of the circuit courts on a proper bill in equity to restrain by interlocutory or final decree the order affecting the rate or rates involved. To accomplish that object, if it be possible to accomplish it, it is necessary that there shall be a change in existing law governing jurisdiction of the circuit court in equity. The Senator from Texas fully realized this, and hence his proposition that the bill shall contain a prohibition against suspension of the order prior to final decree.

Mr. President, I am not able to agree with the Senator from Texas and others as to the power of Congress to so legislate. I have little doubt that if the bill when enacted shall contain such a prohibition it would be unconstitutional in that respect, and fear it will be regarded as so intertwined with the part of the bill authorizing the fixing of rates as to endanger it.

Many of us think the pending measure is in more than one respect of doubtful constitutionality, to say the least of it. I think I may justly say that many of us regard it as unconstitutional in one or two important particulars.

It is our duty, as it is justly to be expected of the Senate, that we shall give to the perfection of the measure, which is of the highest importance, the utmost of our ability, care, and industry. I should greatly dislike, Mr. President, not simply for myself, but for the body, of whose just fame I am as jealous and proud as any Senator can be, that this measure when it shall have passed the Senate, should fail in the courts for any want of constitutionality which we can remedy. It may contain some provisions as to the constitutionality of which many of us have doubt, but that danger should be limited to those provisions only which ought to be incorporated in it if they can constitutionally be incorporated in it, and in order that their constitutionality may be presented to the highest tribunal for determination.

The time has certainly come when the scope of the commerce clause of the Constitution in respect of interstate transportation should be determined by the Supreme Court. This can only be done by the enactment of a statute raising the question.

The weakness, if there be one, in the proposition and in the argument made in support of it—that this proposed provision may constitutionally be enacted—seems to rest in a failure to distinguish between jurisdiction and judicial power. The Constitution, Article III, section 1, says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. * * *
> SEC. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.
> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

I concede, under the decisions, of course, that the circuit and district courts of the United States are statutory courts; that they do not derive their jurisdiction immediately from the Constitution. They are created by the Congress. Their jurisdiction is to be found in the legislation of Congress. For many years Congress withheld from their jurisdiction a large number of cases or controversies enumerated in the Constitution. That Congress could lawfully do this I do not question.

Mr. President, the framers of the Constitution manifestly did not intend to create a judicial department that was to be dependent in the exercise of judicial power upon the will of Congress. They had painful memories of the history of jurisprudence in England. They knew that the bar of England and the fearless judges of England had done more for personal liberty than all the other forces of England could do. They knew, too, that judges of England, holding office by favor simply of the King, and therefore dependent upon his will, had perpetrated wrongs and tyrannies indescribable; for there is no tyranny any worse than the tyranny of a lawless judge. They knew, too, that out of the confusion of legislative and judicial functions in the English system had arisen intolerable abuses. They intended by the Constitution to create, and did create, three coordinate and independent branches of the Government, to each of which was assigned its proper function, clothed with the power essential to their proper discharge. They intended that each should be in its sphere absolutely free from invasion by the others. They created the legislative department to enact rules of action, the executive department to administer the laws, the judicial department (the weakest of all in a way) to hold each of the others, the legislative and the executive, strictly to the limitations of the Constitution. Each was to be permanent as the Government itself until changed by the people.

They clearly contemplated a Federal judicial system. They secured the independence of the judges by making their tenure of office dependent only on good behavior and by preventing the legislative department from starving them into weakness by diminution of their compensation.

It was not intended to create a judicial department that should be defenseless against the passion or unwisdom of the legislative department. They vested, by the same language with which they clothed the other two departments with their functions of government, the judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Supreme Court, of course, could not have existed without legislation by Congress. The constitutional provision was not self-executing, but it laid a mandate upon Congress to organize the Supreme Court and inferior courts. For Congress to have omitted the organization of the Supreme Court would have been revolutionary. For Congress to have omitted the organization and establishment of inferior courts would have been equally revolutionary. The result would have been that the Government as it was made would have failed of organization, for where the Constitution provided for three departments there would have been but two, in fact.

Congress, in obedience to the consititutional mandate, organized the Supreme Court, and the Constitution placed it beyond reach of any subsequent Congress, save to increase or possibly to reduce its numbers. Its jurisdiction is original in but two cases; in all others it is appellate.

My proposition is: That when the Congress confers jurisdiction upon the inferior courts of the United States over any one of the cases or controversies enumerated by the Constitution the judicial power, ex necessitate rei, goes with it, including the instrumentalities which inhere in the jurisdicton and are necessary to its efficient exercise.

It never could have been in the minds of the framers that there could come a time when there would be life judges of the inferior courts without inferior courts.

It is insisted by some that Congress may destroy these inferior courts, and as the greater includes the lesser, it may limit as it sees fit the exercise of judicial power where jurisdiction exists. I do not know what may be the opinion of the Senator from Texas as to the power of Congress to destroy the inferior courts without substituting other inferior courts in their places, but justice to him in his absence requires it to be said in this connection that he did not base his argument for the power of Congress to limit the issue of injunctions as proposed upon any such ground.

I find support, Mr. President, for the proposition for which I am contending in an illuminating opinion upon the judicial clauses of the Constitution, delivered by Mr. Justice Story, of the Supreme Court, in the case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheaton, 304). His reasoning is worth rereading many times. It was dissented from only by one justice, and not by any as to the portion of it which declares specifically the law to be as I am contending for it. It is so important and complete that I beg leave to read it. Speaking for the court, he says, after quoting the third article:

Let this article be carefully weighed and considered. The language of the article throughout is manifestly designed to be mandatory upon the legislature. Its obligatory force is so imperative, that Congress could not, without a violation of its duty, have refused to carry it into operation. "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested [not may be vested] in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Could Congress have lawfully refused to create a Supreme Court, or to vest in it the constitutional jurisdiction? "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive, for their services, a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." Could Congress create or limit any other tenure of the judicial office? Could they refuse to pay, at stated times, the stipulated salary, or diminish it during their continuance in office? But one answer can be given to these questions; it must be in the negative. The object of the Constitution was to establish three great departments of government; the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments. The first was to pass laws, the second to approve and execute them, and the third to expound and enforce them. Without the latter, it would be impossible to carry into effect some of the express provisions of the Constitution. How, otherwise, could crimes against the United States be tried and punished? How could causes between two States be heard and determined? The judicial power must, therefore, be vested in some court, by Congress; and to suppose that it was not an obligation binding on them, but might, at their pleasure, be omitted or declined, is to suppose that, under the sanction of the Constitution, they might defeat the Constitution itself. A construction which would lead to such a result can not be sound.

The same expression, "shall be vested," occurs in other parts of the Constitution in defining the powers of the other coordinate branches of the Government. The first article declares that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." Will it be contended that the legislative power is not absolutely vested? That the words merely refer to some future act and mean only that the legislative power may hereafter be vested? The second article declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." Could Congress vest it in any other person; or is it to await their good pleasure whether it is to vest at all? It is apparent that such a construction in either case would be utterly inadmissible. Why, then, is it entitled to a better support in reference to the judicial department?

If, then, it is the duty of Congress to vest the judicial power of the United States, it is a duty to vest the whole judicial power. The language, if imperative as to one part, is imperative as to all. If it were otherwise, this anomaly would exist, that Congress might successively refuse to vest the jurisdiction in any one class of cases enumerated in the Constitution, and thereby defeat the jurisdiction as to all, for the Constitution has not singled out any class on which Congress are bound to act in preference to others.

The next consideration is as to the courts in which the judicial power shall be vested. It is manifest that a Supreme Court must be established; but whether it be equally obligatory to establish inferior courts is a question of some difficulty. If Congress may lawfully omit to establish inferior courts, it might follow that in some of the enumerated cases the judicial power could nowhere exist. The Supreme Court can have original jurisdiction in two classes of cases only, namely, in cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and in cases in which a State is a party. Congress can not vest any portion of the judicial power of the United States, except in courts ordained and established by itself; and if in any of the cases enumerated in the Constitution the State courts did not then possess jurisdiction, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court (admitting that it could act on State courts) could not reach those cases and, consequently, the injunction of the Constitution, that the judicial power "shall be vested," would be disobeyed. It would seem, therefore, to follow that Congress are bound to create some inferior courts in which to vest all that jurisdiction which, under the Constitution, is exclusively vested in the United States, and of which the Supreme Court can not take original cognizance. They might establish one or more inferior courts; they might parcel out the jurisdiction among such courts from time to time at their own pleasure. But the whole judicial power of the United States should be at all times vested either in an original or appellate form in some courts created under its authority.

It being then established that the language of this clause is imperative, the next question is as to the cases to which it shall apply. The answer is found in the Constitution itself. The judicial power shall extend to all the cases enumerated in the Constitution. As the mode is not limited, it may extend to all such cases, in any form, in which judicial power may be exercised. It may, therefore, extend to them in the shape of original or appellate jurisdiction, or both; for there is nothing in the nature of the cases which binds to the exercise of the one in preference to the other.

BUT EVEN ADMITTING THAT THE LANGUAGE OF THE CONSTITUTION IS NOT MANDATORY AND THAT CONGRESS MAY CONSTITUTIONALLY OMIT TO VEST THE JUDICIAL POWER IN COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES, IT CAN NOT BE DENIED THAT WHEN IT IS VESTED, IT MAY BE EXERCISED TO THE UTMOST CONSTITUTIONAL EXTENT.

The judicial power of the Constitution extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, etc. The words "law and equity," as used in the Constitution, were not used without definite meaning. As to equity, they referred to a system of jurisprudence which had long been established in England and was administered in this country prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company (13 How., 562) the court says:

In exercising this jurisdiction the courts of the Union are not limited by the chancery system adopted by any State, and they exercise their functions in a State where no court of chancery has been established. The usages of the high court of chancery in England, wherever the jurisdiction is exercised, govern the proceedings. This may be said to be the common law of chancery, and since the organization of the Government it has been observed.

* * * * * * *

Under this system, where relief can be given by the English chancery similar relief may be given by the courts of the United States.

The word "law" was used in contradistinction to equity and admiralty and maritime jurisprudence. They referred not simply to the suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized and equitable remedies were administered.

Upon the demand of the States, after the adoption of the Constitution, an amendment was adopted declaring that in suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20 the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, etc., and this meant the jury of the common law.

It is quite plain that the distinction between law and equity expressly recognized in the Constitution can not be abolished. (Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Peters, 443. See also Fenn v. Holme, 21 Howard, 481.)

In equity an issue may be sent to the jury, but the verdict is only advisory. The function of the common-law jury and the effect of its verdict is different.

The preventive relief afforded by equity through injunctions is an essential part of the equity jurisprudence. That jurisprudence came into being only because of the inability of the common law to furnish more than redress for wrongs. It could award damages, but there were an infinite number of cases which its rules and processes did not embrace. The main necessity which called it into existence was the power to afford preventive relief. A bill for permanent injunction was one of the main elements of the system. To strike out of the jurisprudence the bill for injunction would be to destroy the harmony and utility of the jurisdiction. If the power to grant a preliminary injunction, where the efficient exercise of the judicial power in equity demands it, were taken away, the system would be unrecognizable.

In a vast number of cases, Mr. President, the permanent injunction would be fruitless but for the preliminary injunction. It would be an idle thing to decree a permanent injunction to prevent some irremediable wrong if the court did not possess the power in proper cases to prevent the doing of that wrong pendente lite. The first bill in equity I ever drew was for injunction to restrain the negotiation of promissory notes obtained by gross fraud from a farmer and secured by a mortgage on his farm. What relief would equity afford in such case without the preliminary writ, and that, too, without notice? Innumerable cases occur to any lawyer of experience, and are noted in the books, and it has been so from the beginning, in which without preliminary injunction the judicial power of equity to permanently enjoin would be as idle as the wind that blows.

I have not seen a criticism of the reasoning and conclusion of Mr. Justice Story which I have read. Mr. Justice Field, in the case of Taylor v. Hammond (4 Wallace, 411), thus refers to it:

> How far this judicial power is exclusive, or may, by the legislation of Congress, be made exclusive, in the courts of the United States has been much discussed, though there has been no direct adjudication upon the point. In the opinion delivered in the case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheat., 334) Mr. Justice Story comments upon the fact that there are two classes of cases enumerated in the clause cited between which a distinction is drawn; that the first class includes cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and that, with reference to this class, the expression is that the judicial power shall extend to all cases; but that in the subsequent part of the clause, which embraces all the other cases of national cognizance and forms the second class, the word "all" is dropped. And the learned justice appears to have thought the variation in the language the result of some determinate reason, and suggests that, with respect to the first class, it may have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution imperatively to extend the judicial power either in an original or appellate form to all cases, and, with respect to the latter class, to leave it to Congress to qualify the jurisdiction in such manner as public policy might dictate.

Mr. Justice Field further says:

> Many cogent reasons and various considerations of public policy are stated in support of this suggestion. The vital importance of all the cases enumerated in the first class to the national sovereignty is mentioned as a reason which may have warranted the distinction and which would seem to require that they should be vested exclusively in the national courts—a consideration which does not apply, at least with equal force, to cases of the second class.

Mr. Justice Miller seems to take much the same view. (Miller on the Constitution, p. 312 et seq.)

Now, Mr. President, let me repeat, although I have repeated much, how is it possible that the Congress, having conferred jurisdiction in equity upon an inferior court over one of the cases or controversies named in the Constitution, can withhold in that case the judicial power of the Constitution? If it may do so in part, it may do so altogether. If it may prohibit, although necessary to the exercise of the judicial power, the right to issue in a proper case a preliminary injunction, why may it not withhold the power to decree a permanent injunction? Whether when the jurisdiction exists the efficient exercise of the judicial power requires the issue of a preliminary injunction would seem to be a question for the judge—a judicial and not a political question—and if Congress may say that, whatever the showing may be, the court having jurisdiction of the suit shall not, although it be, in the opinion of the court, demanded, issue a preliminary injunction, does not the Congress rather than the court really exercise the judicial power? Is it not a commingling of the legislative with the judicial functions? Is it not an emasculation of the judicial power, and an invasion by one department of the Government of the power of another? If the distinction between the jurisdiction which the Congress may withhold and the exercise of the judicial power where jurisdiction exists is destroyed, and the Congress may regulate by act the exercise of the judicial power itself, is this the Government which the framers of the Constitution intended to create?

Is the judiciary an independent department of the Government, which the Constitution intended it to be? If the power exists in any degree to interfere with the exercise of judicial power, except by regulating procedure and practice, it is for Congress alone to say how far that power shall be exercised. It is inconceivable that the judiciary, whose function under the Constitution it is to see to it, among other things, that the executive department and the legislative department keep within the limitations of the Constitution, overturn acts when, in their judgment, they are violative of the fundamental charter, can be, to the extent involved in the amendment here, subject to Congressional control.

It is the function of the Supreme Court and the inferior courts to secure to the citizens the guaranties of the Constitution of life, liberty, and property. It certainly could not have been in the contemplation of the framers that their power to discharge this function should be exercised in given cases not according to the judgment of the court, but according to the legislative will.

It is said by Mr. Justice Baldwin in ex parte Crane (5 Peters, 190–202):

> Though the courts of the United States are capable of exercising the whole judicial power as conferred by the Constitution, and though Congress are bound to provide by law for its exercise in all cases to which that judicial power extends, yet it has not been done, and much of it remains dormant for the want of legislation to enable the courts to exercise it, it having been repeatedly and uniformly decided by this court that legislative provisions are indispensable to give effect to a power to bring into action the constitutional jurisdiction of the supreme and inferior courts.

There is no question about that.

It is said that in the judiciary act there are prohibitions upon the power of the circuit courts of the United States in equity. That is true. There is a prohibition in the judiciary act that the court shall not have jurisdiction where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law. That is declaratory of the law as it was before the adoption of the Constitution. That is one of the fundamental principles of jurisdiction in equity.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the law now, is it not?

Mr. SPOONER. That is the law now.

Mr. MORGAN. Under the Constitution?

Mr. SPOONER. Under the Constitution, and it was the law of the English chancery before the Constitution. Wherever redress could be afforded at the common law those who were wronged were remitted to the common law; wherever the common law would not and could not afford relief, recourse was had to the courts of chancery if the case were such as to render it possible—a splendid system of jurisprudence, Mr. President. If one will read the maxims of equity, he will find that they are golden lines. There will never come a civilization which they will not fit; they seem almost the "perfection of human wisdom," and how splendidly, all in all, they have been administered by the courts of the United States.

The Supreme Court, sitting here at the capital, removed from the passions of the multitude, far above the prejudices excited among the people, however strong the clamor, however unpopular the litigant, however they may be threatened from without, has gone on in that calm, quiet way which the Constitution contemplated in the discharge of judicial duty. It has done more to assert the vital principles of the Constitution and to protect the people of the United States against wrongs existing and wrongs threatened in a large way than all the Congresses that have convened.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator submit to an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; although I know I am making a very disjointed argument.

Mr. RAYNER. It is a highly instructive one to me, but I understand the proposition is that under the Constitution Congress has the right to ordain and establish inferior courts.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. Suppose Congress had never ordained or established any inferior courts?

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose Congress had never established the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. No; inferior courts; the Constitution provides for the organization of the Supreme Court. Suppose that Congress—because this is right at the threshold of this inquiry—had never established or ordained an inferior court of the United States, is there any way on earth by which Congress could have been compelled to ordain or establish inferior courts?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly not.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, now, one moment. There is no power by which you could have compelled Congress to ordain and establish an inferior court?

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. RAYNER. It did establish and ordain inferior courts?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. If there is no way to compel it to establish or ordain an inferior court, why can not Congress destroy an inferior court—abolish an inferior court?

Mr. SPOONER. There are two or three answers to the Senator. There was no way to compel Congress to organize the Supreme Court of the United States. No bill for specific performance would anywhere lie. There was only one power under the bending sky by which that mandatory duty could have been enforced and that is the power in whose interest we are all working here if we are faithful; that is the power of public opinion; that is the power of the people. To have failed to organize it would have been a monumental piece of treason to the Constitution; and it is not to be supposed or imputed to Congress, as the predicate, I beg to say to my friend, of any argument on that subject, it seems to me.

Mr. RAYNER. I am not now speaking of treason or anarchy. I am speaking of constitutional power. I am aware of the fact that if Congress destroyed the courts we would have a condition of anarchy.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. The organization of the Supreme Court is provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. But it required legislation, did it not?

Mr. RAYNER. It required legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose Congress had not legislated?

Mr. RAYNER (reading)—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court——

Mr. SPOONER. "And"——

and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

After vesting the power, the next article provides that—

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction.

Here is the Constitution vesting in the Supreme Court original jurisdiction, and it is giving Congress the right to establish and ordain inferior courts. What do you do with the decision which I referred to before here, in which a unanimous court, in construing that provision, says:

It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained and established the inferior courts and distributed to them their respective powers, they could not be restricted or divested by Congress. But as it has made no such distribution one of two consequences must result—either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions.

You do not object to my interrupting you?

Mr. SPOONER. No; if it is not too long.

Mr. RAYNER. There are only three or four lines more.

Mr. SPOONER. Go ahead.

Mr. RAYNER. Very well.

The first of these inferences has never been asserted, and could not be defended with any show of reason, and if not, the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence. And it would seem to follow also that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

Mr. SPOONER. I admitted that within fifteen minutes after I began this wearisome address.

Mr. RAYNER. You admitted it?

Mr. SPOONER. I admit it now.

Mr. RAYNER. But your argument is dead against the case.

Mr. SPOONER. That begs the question. My argument is not in the slightest degree, with due deference to my friend from Maryland——

Mr. RAYNER. I beg your pardon.

Mr. SPOONER. Contrary to the decision or its reasoning.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, before the Senator goes to that, let me ask just one question, because it seems to me that the lines of opposition are converging and we want to get to some practical understanding if we can.

I understood you to say, in the course of your argument, that you did not object to a provision in this bill that before the suspending orders are issued, either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the shipper should have some notice of the issuance of the orders. Did I understand you to say that you did not object to that?

Mr. SPOONER. Whether I said it or not, I say it now.

Mr. RAYNER. Then let me say——

Mr. SPOONER. That simply regulates the practice.

Mr. RAYNER. It is a matter which goes right to the heart of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me answer the Senator's question.

Mr. RAYNER. It is a matter which goes to the heart of the controversy.

Mr. SPOONER. That is an afterthought. The argument that has been made here and splendidly made, which I am attempting to controvert, was not upon the question whether Congress can regulate the practice of issuing injunctions so as to require notice; not at all. The judiciary act did that. It was provided in the judiciary act that no injunction should be issued by a Federal court without reasonable notice. It was provided in 1872 that no injunction should be issued by a Federal judge without notice. But the Federal judge was authorized, where, in his judgment, it was necessary to do justice, at the time of issuing the order to show cause, to grant a restraining order. Nobody disputes that. But it is a far, far cry from that to the proposition that the Congress can prohibit a court of equity, clothed by its legislation with jurisdiction and with the judicial power of the Constitution in equity, from granting a preliminary injunction even with notice. Now, to come back——

Mr. RAYNER. I never made any such argument as that.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not arguing this bill. I am discussing this question. I may be wrong about it. This is what troubles me, however: Does the power exist in Congress to confer jurisdiction upon a court to exercise the judicial power of the Constitution in equity, and at the same time has it the power to chip off the judicial power as it chooses, to give power to a court of equity to entertain a bill for specific performance, and yet deny the court the power to issue the writs essential to carry that jurisdiction into effect?

If the broad claim rather argued by the Senator just now, far beyond this matter of notice, is the law in this country, the people of the United States may well beware, because in the last analysis the protection of the people of the United States in the enjoyment of all the personal guaranties of the Constitution is to be found in the courts of the United States. It is not to be found in the Congress. It is not to be found in the White House. It is to be found in the courts.

The preservation of the Constitution itself is to be found in the courts. The last refuge of liberty, of property rights, large and small is in the judiciary of the United States. If you will draw the distinction between jurisdiction and judicial power, I am content. What does the Senator say about that?

Mr. RAYNER. I say, if the Senator will allow me, that this goes back to the proposition upon which I respectfully agree with the Senator from Wisconsin. If you were to take the words "or be suspended" out of this bill, a court of equity would still have the power to issue a preliminary injunction. That is the statement of the Senator—if those words were out of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. I think most of us agree with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. The courts could do so with them in the bill or out of the bill.

Mr. RAYNER. Why, then, do you put them in the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not put them in the bill.

Mr. RAYNER. Why do you object to taking them out of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object.

Mr. RAYNER. Then we are getting very close together.

Let me ask the Senator this: If the words "or be suspended" were taken out of this bill—this is a practical proposition——

Mr. SPOONER. Let us have the question.

Mr. RAYNER. I will get to the question as quickly as I can. The bill reads:

Unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

If the words "or be suspended" were eliminated from the bill, courts of equity would still have a right to issue preliminary injunctions?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. Why did you put them in the bill? That is the question.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object to striking them out.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator does not object to their being stricken out, does the Senator object to adding:

The courts shall not issue preliminary or temporary injunctions without notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. That is the point in controversy. You may call it practice or not; that is, that the inferior courts of the United States shall not issue injunctions against a decision by the Interstate Commerce Commission without giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to be heard in answer to the bill for an injunction. You may call it practice or not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator can not make any issue with me on that; not at all. His argument the other day, which was quite elaborately based on the words which he recites, was based on nothing if he thinks to-day those words mean nothing whether they are in or taken out. I think they mean nothing in the bill. If they are not in the bill the court would have the power to grant preliminary injunctions. If they are left in the bill, with some other language there, perhaps the court in almost every instance would be obliged to grant a preliminary injunction. I have been in favor of taking them out of the bill. They serve no useful purpose there, it seems to me.

Mr. RAYNER. I agree with you.

Mr. SPOONER. But I have understood Senators on the other side, at any rate the Senator from Texas and some others, not to be content with taking those words out of the bill, but to insist that there shall be put in the bill a provision preventing the granting by interlocutory order of any injunction.

Mr. RAYNER. I understood that fully.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the Senator's opinion about that?

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator's opinion is that you are delivering a very instructive argument upon that proposition, and that there may possibly be some question about it. My argument the other day was based upon the proposition that a suspending order without notice was not a constitutional incident; that to give the court the right to issue a suspending order without notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission was not a constitutional incident under the fifth amendment. I think the lines of opposition are gradually converging on this matter. Would the Senator agree to an amendment here saying that the courts shall issue no suspending order without notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission? That is the point.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not in charge of this bill.

Mr. RAYNER. Would you agree to that?

Mr. SPOONER. I have said that twice. I speak only for myself.

Mr. RAYNER. Then we are getting pretty close together.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems, from the Senator's present statement, that I have been rather close to him all the time. I did not know it.

Mr. RAYNER. I am very glad to have you. You are a very good man to be close to.

Mr. SPOONER. I am obliged to the Senator. But the proposition he is making——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin let me ask him a little side question, as it were?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator mean—he has repeated it several times and that is the reason why I make the inquiry—when he says Senators "on the other side," referring to this side?

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator from Maryland the other day to speak for Senators on the other side.

Mr. RAYNER. I especially refrained from doing that. I said three times, and if the Senator will be kind enough to read what I said he will find it, that I spoke for no one except myself, and the Senator from Texas also said he spoke for no one but himself. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and I intend to vote for it if it has no other vote in the Senate. I think there may possibly be some question about the proposition, but I never have thought for a moment that there was any doubt about the proposition that when a rate is fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission no carrier should have the right to go into court and obtain an order suspending that rate without giving the Interstate Commission notice of its application to the court.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. One moment. Speaking now for myself——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to the Senator from Georgia. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I wish to apologize to the Senator from Wisconsin for somewhat diverting his attention from the line of his argument. But this is a question upon which, so far as I know, there is not a division on party lines.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true.

Mr. BACON. Therefore I think it is rather inappropriate for the Senator, as he has done several times in his argument, to refer to the position of Senators "on the other side." Some of us have not yet exactly indicated what our position may be on some of these law points, although we heartily favor the bill in its substance.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator. It is always a great pleasure to me to be able to agree with him, and I do agree with him that it was an inappropriate thing for me to say.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. The point is that I think we are closing up a part of the controversy.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. RAYNER. We are getting pretty close to it on suspending orders.

Mr. SPOONER. No; we are not.

Mr. RAYNER. You and I are.

Mr. SPOONER. No; you and I are not.

Mr. RAYNER. Why not?

Mr. SPOONER. Because you will vote for a proposition prohibiting the court from granting an interlocutory injunction.

Mr. RAYNER. I will.

Mr. SPOONER. I will not.

Mr. RAYNER. If that is defeated, and if the Senator will offer an amendment that the Commission shall have notice before the granting of an interlocutory injunction, I will vote for the amendment. I will vote for the amendment if you will give the Commission a right to be heard and not go with your orders before a Federal judge and have the rate enjoined without notice.

Mr. SPOONER. It would be as much the Senator's rate as mine.

Mr. RAYNER. How?

Mr. SPOONER. You said "your orders."

Mr. RAYNER. I am talking about the orders of the Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the position of the Senator from Maryland, and in order that there may be no mistake about it I will restate it. He is in favor of an amendment prohibiting, no matter what the bill may show, no matter what the exhibit may show, the granting of an interlocutory injunction by the circuit courts of the United States to suspend, pending hearing of all parties, the order. I am not, for I believe it would make the bill unconstitutional.

The Senator, secondly, is in favor, if he can not get that, of prohibiting the issue of an injunction without notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am not in the slightest opposed to that. So that so far as the Senator and I are concerned we understand each other at last. The amendment, or the only part which I am discussing, is this:

Provided, That no rate or charge, regulation or practice prescribed by the Commission shall be set aside or suspended by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order of the court.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I said the other day in making a report on this bill, I spoke for no one but myself. Unfortunately, I am not in a position to confer with the majority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and get a united opinion of such majority to represent that committee in indicating what its wishes are. Therefore, I again speak only for myself when I say, without any pretense of knowing anything about the law or these constitutional refinements, that if the Supreme Court shall hold that Congress has no power to control these courts which it has created, in an attempt to give the people the relief which is sought in regard to railroad rates and other regulations of railroads, I believe the people will send to Congress men who will give them relief, if they have to do it in the way that Congress once before notified the court, by reason of public opinion, that the legal-tender acts, which had been declared unconstitutional, had to be declared constitutional, and the court was reformed in some way so that it discovered that they were constitutional.

I predict that sooner or later these refinements will all be brushed aside by a Congress which will enact a law prohibiting any inferior judge from suspending the order of the Commission which has given the people relief.

Mr. SPOONER. I never derive very much information or benefit from the advice of a man who prefaces his remarks by saying that he does not know anything about the subject.

The Senator from South Carolina is an honest man. He wants the right thing done about this bill. He wants it, when it passes the Senate, to be a constitutional bill. He does not want it emasculated. Neither do I. He does not want it to contain a taint which would make it a failure after it is enacted. But the Senator must not assume that he is more patriotic than the rest of us. He must not assume that those of us who have spent our lives in the study of the law are not better advised than those who have not as to what is safely and what is not safely within the Constitution. The Senator said the other day that he is a "cornfield" lawyer.

Mr. TILLMAN. I repeat it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have had many "cornfield" lawyers come to me and pay me, to get the opinion and advice of a lawyer who had studied and practiced the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless the Senator can not refine away this cornfield common sense, that whatever you can create you can control.

Mr. SPOONER. There it is—"cornfield common sense." If the Supreme Court of the United States does not square its decisions with the cornfield common sense of the Senator from South Carolina, he would reform the Supreme Court of the United States; and if the Supreme Court of the United States did square its decisions with some of the cornfield common sense of the Senator from South Carolina, the people of the United States would need to reform the court.

Now, what does the Senator mean? We want the same thing that the Senator wants. Does not the Senator believe—perhaps he would call that a refinement—that the dropping out of the present law of the jury trial provided for by the Constitution, helps this bill any?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I want it put back.

Mr. SPOONER. Did you learn that in the cornfield——

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Or from lawyers?

Mr. TILLMAN. I got it from my little knowledge of English jurisprudence and American liberty which I inherited with my mother's milk.

Mr. SPOONER. All right.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Wisconsin can not conclude to-night.

Mr. SPOONER. I only want to say this——

Mr. TELLER. I thought perhaps he would like to quit now and resume in the morning. We want him to go on and finish his speech—everybody does—and I know there are several points on which he can not touch to-night, and I think he intends to touch upon them. Otherwise he would not do justice to the case.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not done justice to the case.

Mr. TELLER. So far as you have gone we do not find any fault. I should like to give the Senator an opportunity to postpone his remarks until to-morrow, if he wants it.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will acquit me of any purpose to offend him.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never found the Senator to be malicious.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will permit me. I appreciate his ability and aptitude for the discharge of public duty here, his patriotism, his industry. I appreciate his friendship. I would not want it if I did not appreciate him as an honest man. But the Senator from South Carolina is a little apt, without knowing it, by innuendo to impugn the good faith of men who believe in him and who are as faithful to the public service as he can be. The Senator ought not, because I am dealing with a question of great importance and dealing with a question of constitutional law, to assume, as he seems to do, that this is simply the legal refinement of the lawyer. Does the Senator think for one moment that we are not trying here to make a good bill of this?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not said so.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that those of us who as lawyers have studied this bill are not doing it as a matter of public duty to help the people in this legislation?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not said so.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina would not, if it were left to him, want to have the responsibility of this bill as it came from the House?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I never would have put in it a third that there is in it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator would have left some things out of it that ought to be in it, as the House left some things out of it that ought to be in it; and the Senator may very well be glad, on this complicated and intricate subject, to have the advice and assistance of the lawyers of this body, a class of men a part of whose habit of life it is to be loyal in the discharge of duty to a client, if it be a client; to the people, if they are in the public service.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin does me wrong when he imagines for a moment that I assume that I am any better than any other Senator here in my devotion to the people. I do not claim that. I do not pretend any such thing.

Mr. SPOONER. I know in your sober moments you do not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am as sober now as I ever was in my life. The Senator has not made me as drunk to-day as he usually does.

Mr. SPOONER. The other day the Senator from South Carolina challenged the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TILLMAN. On what point?

Mr. SPOONER. As being an attorney for the Pennsylvania Railroad——

Mr. TILLMAN. I had every reason to believe it, because it had been sent broadcast by the Associated Press and all the newspapers.

Mr. SPOONER. As being a man with whom the President could not safely advise on matters of this kind.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say I had seen it. I do not want to have anything to say in regard to the Senator from Pennsylvania, but if the Senator from Wisconsin wants to challenge me——

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will bring out the evidence upon which I based that statement.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not challenge, but the Senator ought to know that he is not to take everything for granted. I have seen things in the newspapers about the Senator from South Carolina. Does the Senator think I would believe them?

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not say I believed these other reports.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think I would tell them in public as statements which I believe? Not at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply stated about the Senator from Pennsylvania what has been common property to every man who reads newspapers in the United States, and I said it right here where he could hear it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Pennsylvania—and that is the wickedness of this whirlwind of detraction—a great lawyer, opposed for confirmation (so long ago I dare say it now) upon the theory that he had been in the employ of corporations, has done more, and did do more during his tenure of the Attorney-General's Office to enforce the antitrust law and to carry to successful decision in the highest courts the laws enacted by Congress to protect the people against unlawful combinations than all the men who have been in the Attorney-General's Office for twenty years. I say that without reflection upon his predecessors.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not let us go off on the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not want to drag him in.

Mr. SPOONER. It is the principle of the thing.

Mr. TILLMAN. And the Senator brings it up, too, in an unpleasant connection. Why do you not go back to this proposition of cornfield law that the courts of the United States, except the Supreme Court, being statutory courts created by Congress, can be controlled by Congress?

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator mean by "control?"

Mr. TILLMAN. Anything; "control" means everything.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the control the Senator would have Congress exercise over the courts. The Senator from Maryland says, sotto voce, "to destroy." The Senator from Maryland is an orator and a lawyer of extraordinary ability——

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and you two great lawyers are right here pulling wool over these little technicalities, and when I give you the law you will not take it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. When the Senator from Maryland and I are in conflict on legal propositions it is the place of a cornfield lawyer to keep out of the controversy. [Laughter.]

Now, the Senator from Maryland said it could destroy. Does the Senator from Maryland mean that? Does the Senator from Maryland mean that under the Constitution Congress may pass a law destroying the circuit courts of the United States and the district courts of the United States, putting no inferior tribunal or tribunals in their place in which shall be vested the judicial power of the Constitution?

Mr. RAYNER. I will answer, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean that?

Mr. RAYNER. If you pass a law here and have no court to review the decision, so that you can not execute the fifth amendment, that law would be void. That is an answer to the question. The law itself would be void. For instance, if there is no court now in existence with any right to review the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Hepburn bill, then the very law proposed to be passed here would, under the Minnesota case, be void. I agree with the Senator upon that proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that Congress has the constitutional power to obliterate all the inferior courts of the United States by a valid act which does not itself substitute some inferior tribunal in their place?

Mr. RAYNER. I believe that if Congress were to-day to abolish either the district courts or circuit courts——

Mr. SPOONER. Either of them?

Mr. RAYNER. Allow me to finish my answer. If Congress to-day should pass an act abolishing the circuit courts or the district courts either, while that act might be anarchy, there is nothing unconstitutional about it, and nothing the Senator from Wisconsin has said has satisfied me that there would be anything unconstitutional about it. We are not discussing anarchy and we are not discussing treason. I say if there were a law here now before us abolishing the district courts of the United States, there would be nothing unconstitutional in that act.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maryland concedes my contention. He answered my question as I expected a lawyer like him to answer it. He dared not, as a lawyer, answer it affirmatively, and he did not. He would not here say that it is in the constitutional power of Congress to obliterate the inferior courts of the United States, the courts of equity, the courts of law, the courts in which all offenses against the laws of the United States are tried, the courts, Mr. President, which protect life, liberty, and property under the Constitution, putting none in their place. He would not claim that.

Mr. RAYNER rose.

Mr. SPOONER. Wait a moment. That would be anarchy. That would be hoisting the red flag of revolution.

Mr. RAYNER. I admit all that.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be Jacobinism.

Mr. RAYNER. I admit that.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be treason to the Constitution. The Senator would not say Congress could do that. But the Senator did say that the Congress could obliterate the district courts of the United States or the circuit courts of the United States. Probably so; but that is not all. That would leave the great equity tribunal on the one hand or it would leave the great law tribunal on the other.

But I want to say to the Senator, as he has met me half way, he ought to qualify his proposition and say that the Congress could wipe out the district court or the circuit court if by the same act it clothed the survivor with the law power and the equity power of the Constitution, as the case might be.

Judge Story was not wrong. The mandatory language of the Constitution, that the judicial power of the United States, in law and equity, "shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," meant something. Out of the exercise of that power, or the execution of it, came the judiciary act, drawn by Oliver Ellsworth in the main, a very important man in the Constitutional Convention, afterwards Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and from that day to this, Mr. President, for over a hundred years, we have had the circuit courts and the district courts created by the Congress under the Constitution exercising these functions, and never until now——

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has said three times that we had absolute control over the inferior courts of the United States, in the case in 8 Howard, another case in 18 Wallace, and the case in 147 U. S., and from that proposition and these premises they have argued the right to regulate them. Now, I do not pretend to say that it would not be anarchy, and chaos, and Jacobinism to abolish them, but the constitutional right of Congress to destroy what the Constitution has given it the right to ordain and establish is unquestionable in my mind. States can destroy the courts, if they want to. Suppose a State should fail to provide by statute for the crime of murder or any other crime; what would that be? Would that be unconstitutional? It would be anarchy; it would be chaos; it would be Jacobinism, or anything else you may call it; but we are arguing now the constitutional question whether Congress, having the right to ordain and establish, has not the right to destroy. The Constitution gives it the right to ordain and establish. It never would destroy our judicial system; there is not the remotest danger of doing it; the question is utterly impractical and a visonary question, but that it has the constitutional right to do it I never heard questioned by anyone except the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. The argument of the Senator is, on the assumption Congress has the power to destroy these courts, substituting none other for them, that Congress has the power, the courts remaining as they are, clothed with the jurisdiction in equity and law, to emasculate that jurisdiction in special cases. That is the argument. The greater includes the lesser. The predicate in the last analysis upon which the contention rests that Congress may take away from a court of equity the power to grant an interlocutory injunction is the power of Congress to revolutionize the country, to destroy these courts.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me say a word to the Senator before he closes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield.

Mr. RAYNER. There has not been one word said upon this side—I will speak of this side now—in opposition to giving the courts a full review over the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about that.

Mr. RAYNER. But the Senator's argument tends in the direction that we here were willing to destroy the inferior courts of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about that, nor do I think it of anyone here.

Mr. RAYNER. The amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] proposed the proposition to give the courts a full review—to let the case go up to the courts and give them the right to try the case over again—and the controversy between us was whether or not suspending orders ought to be issued without limitation, without qualification, and without giving notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the issue.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is making the same observations he has made several times this afternoon. They mean now what they did on each occasion, nothing more and nothing less. I am not discussing this bill, nor whether it is necessary to its constitutionality that there be incorporated in it a provision for a review. I think it is necessary; but I am not discussing that. I am discussing simply the validity of a proposition which has been offered and which I read for myself, and which I think is as I read it. That is what I am discussing, and not the question to which the Senator alludes.

Now, Mr. President, I have spoken under some embarrassment. I will be glad if I may be permitted to conclude in the morning.

Mr. TELLER. I am glad the Senator from Wisconsin will go on to-morrow. The Senator says he has spoken under some embarrassment. I think it is pretty difficult for a man to make a legal argument when he does not occupy the floor more than half the time. There are some points that some of us lawyers in this body would like to hear the Senator upon. I should hope that to-morrow when the Senator takes the floor Senators who may not agree with him will wait until he has a fair opportunity to present his views of the law. There are several points in the bill that any lawyer who has read it must have trouble with. As has been said, it is not a political question. It is an economical question, a question that the people are concerned in and that the property of the country is concerned in. I think we should give the Senator a fair opportunity to present his case, and if anyone wants to challenge it he should challenge it later.

I have heard the Senator say that he thought there are some unconstitutional provisions in the bill. That is what I want to hear him address himself to to-morrow.

Mr. SPOONER. I have been in the habit generally of outlining my own observations.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I expect the Senator to do that.

Mr. SPOONER. I intend later to discuss the bill, but I have not intended to do so to-day. I do not object to interruptions. I came here ill, and that is what I referred to as an embarrassment.

Mr. RAYNER. I was interrupted a number of times myself.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object to that at all. I intend to confine myself to a discussion of this one proposition. I wish to discuss the proposition to-morrow that, admitting, for the purposes of the argument, the power of Congress generally to deprive the circuit courts of the United States of the power to grant interlocutory injunctions, to do it in this bill would be upon grounds peculiar to itself unconstitutional.

Mr. TELLER. Of course, I did not intend to intimate that I was going to direct the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

Mr. TELLER. But, knowing something of his views, I want to hear him on two or three other points in the bill. I have an inquiring mind on those questions; and I should like to hear some man upon them who is a recognized authority, as is the Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to hear him discuss those questions.

I do not mean to say that I agree with everything the Senator said here to-day, but I have felt inclined to let him complete his remarks, and if I had any difference of opinion with him I would express it on another day. I know it is not quite easy for a Senator to lay out a plan for the discussion of a legal question and then be diverted by questions that sometimes are not strictly appropriate and proper to what he is discussing. That is what I meant to suggest to the Senator. I meant nothing else.

Mr. SPOONER. I am certain of that.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, there are many of us who are not constitutional lawyers, and not even "cornfield" lawyers, and we would really be glad to listen to the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator on constitutional questions and on law with the hope that he may enlighten us so that we can vote intelligently upon the bill that is before us.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House (No. 369), have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report the following in lieu thereof:

"Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 12707) entitled 'An act to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States,' be, and hereby is, taken from the Speaker's table, with the Senate amendments thereto, to the end that the said amendments be, and hereby are, disagreed to; and a conference be, and hereby is, asked with the Senate on the disagreeing votes on the said amendments, and the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report, and on that I ask the previous question.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, the House at this session of Congress passed a bill admitting to statehood Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State, and Arizona and New Mexico as another State; two States out of the four Territories. That bill went to the Senate, and came back to the House with sundry amendments, forty in all. Two of those amendments were important ones. One of them eliminated from the bill the provision for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico, the other substituted for the House appropriation of certain lands a different appropriation. As a result, under the rules of the House, the bill would require consideration in Committee of the Whole. Under our practice, therefore, it went at once to the Speaker's table, and from the Speaker's table it would have gone by reference to the Committee on Territories had it not been for an agreement between the parties representing the opposing interests, that it should remain on the Speaker's table. It is now on the Speaker's table, and it can be taken therefrom only in one of three ways: Either, first, by unanimous consent, which of course in this instance can not be had; or, second, by reference to the Committee on Territories; or, third, by a special rule.

If the bill came from the Speaker's table by unanimous consent or by a reference to the Committee on Territories and its subsequent report it would require consideration in the Committee of the Whole. It would require, in other words, the consideration of forty amendments, and the bill would be upon the Calendar without any special privilege whereby it could be reached. It is manifest, therefore, that if we are to have speedy legislation and an adjustment of the differences between the two Houses, the bill must be at once sent to conference, and that is the purpose of the rule that I have introduced. If it be adopted the bill will be taken from the Speaker's table, Senate amendments will be disagreed to, and a conference asked. If the resolution be not adopted the bill will remain on the Speaker's table, subject to be referred to the Committee on Territories by the Speaker, to remain there until that committee shall see fit to report it back to the House.

Mr. Speaker, having explained the parliamentary situation, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this rule presents to the House a plain proposition. Whoever votes "aye"—that is, to adopt the rule—votes to cut off and vote down any motion to concur in any Senate amendment which would otherwise, under the rules of the House, have precedence. Mr. Speaker, the usual course of procedure this morning ought have been reversed. We ought to have had, first, the reading and approval of the Journal, and then the moving of the previous question upon this rule, and then an invocation by the Chaplain for the mercy of God upon this Republican House. [Applause and laughter.] In my opinion, they will need it before they get through monkeying with this proposition. I ask those of you who are going to vote for this rule, What is your object in doing it? Why will you cast the vote? What is the object of the leading coterie of the House? Is it to yield later and admit Oklahoma as a State in the Union, as is being bruited as an inducement for your support? My friends, those of you who believe that had best remember the old adage and "fear the Greeks who are bearing gifts." And if it be true that there is an intention later on to yield and admit Oklahoma, then what infinite foolishness and childishness is all this thundering in the index? If you are ready to force a later yielding, why not force it now and save time?

Mr. Speaker, I shall consume no more time. I have appealed to your side of the House once or twice, and have warned them. "Though one rose from the dead" to warn them again, his voice would fall utterly impressionless at their feet.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, no man regrets more than I to be compelled to vote against the majority of his party, even when that majority is wrong. It is useless to discuss the purpose of this rule. It is perfectly apparent it is a part of a prearranged programme. The object of this rule is to coerce the minority on this side of the House to vote against their honest judgment. [Applause.] The purpose of this rule is to compel us to commit an unnatural crime against Arizona in order that we may be just to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. This rule links the iniquitous with the righteous and demands that we take both or nothing.

The only reply to these statements is that you are an insurgent. That statement commands neither my respect nor my fear. [Applause.] I am comforted with the thought that the regular of to-day is the insurgent of to-morrow. [Applause.] Many of the most illustrious of the majority to-day but yesterday were enrolled among the most uncompromising of insurgents. The history of the world shows that the defeated are the rebels; that the victorious are the patriots. We may be insurgents in this House, we may be in the minority here; but throughout the country we are in the countless majority. [Applause.]

Public sentiment in favor of admitting Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, without regard to New Mexico and Arizona, is making the atmosphere so hot that those who are opposed to it can not long breathe it and live. Mark the prediction! The insurgents of to-day will be the victors of to-morrow. The rebel of his party will be the patriot of his country. There is nothing involved in this matter except the remote contingency of two additional United States Senators, and every man in this House knows that that is the whole truth. The people know it is the truth, and yet the business of this country must be held up and embarrassed while we wrangle about it.

The people are looking on in amazement and disgust. It is our duty to vote down this rule and settle this question here and now. It is our duty to give statehood to the Indian Territory and Oklahoma and leave the destiny of Arizona and New Mexico to the future. A few days ago the illustrious and beloved Speaker of this House said that the world was growing better; that the people of the present were as honest and intelligent as those who had gone before. To that doctrine I unreservedly subscribe. I do not believe that wisdom will perish from the earth with this Congress. For one I am willing to to do our duty now and trust something to the honesty, the wisdom, the justice, and the judgment of those who shall come hereafter. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULKERSON].

Mr. FULKERSON. Mr. Speaker, having voted against the adoption of the rule which had the twofold effect of cutting off all right of amendment and of preventing a majority of this body from expressing their real sentiments as to the merits or the demerits of the double-barreled proposition involved in the Hamilton bill, and afterwards having cast my vote for the passage of that same bill, a word of explanation for such seemingly contradictory conduct may not be entirely out of order.

I voted against the adoption of that rule for two reasons, either of which, in my judgment, was more than sufficient to justify my course.

First, I deny the right—not the power, however—of this or any other body to so combine two separate, distinct, and entirely independent propositions that a Member can not vote either aye or nay, nor can he refuse to vote and feel that by so doing he has done his whole duty. There was in this instance no reason for so combining the two double-statehood propositions, and no Member on this floor has yet put forth even a fair excuse for so doing. Hence I voted against the adoption of what I consider an unfair and unjust rule.

Second, I am unalterably opposed to the admission of New Mexico and Arizona Territories to statehood, either united or separated. They and each of them are now in the same condition that every other State of the Union has been in at some period of that State's history, save and except the original thirteen States, to which number, for special reasons, might be added the Lone Star State. The Territories of Arizona and New Mexico are not now fitted for statehood, as this body well knows. Then why not allow them to proceed on their weary way in the same manner that other new States have proceeded? Give them time; if it takes ten years, all right; if it takes a hundred years, all right; but give them an opportunity to show themselves worthy and well qualified, and before admitting them at any future time compel them to do so. The majority of this side of the Chamber admit that neither is entitled to statehood alone, but on the theory that two negatives make an affirmative, I suppose, you try to convince yourselves and this House that they should be admitted as a single State. But not so. Two Territories wholly unfitted for statehood can not be combined so as to eliminate all objectionable features and stand, thus united, the perfect example of what a Territory ought to be before the greater estate of statehood is conferred. Numbers alone do not make a State, nor are they the strongest factor in determining the right to statehood. The quality should count for more than the quantity. The immediate future prospects of the proposed State—for wealth, for industry, for intelligence, and for all those many qualities that go to make up a strong and powerful community, a community capable of self-government, with an ever-increasing tendency toward still further cultivation of those capabilities—should all be taken into account. Until any given Territory reaches such a stage of development it should not have the effrontery to come here and ask for statehood, and even if it does we should have the moral courage to refuse to grant such a request. The mere possibility that some future Congress may fall so far short in the performance of its duty as to forget the responsibilities which may rest upon it and in an evil hour do something that might turn out wrong, or perhaps enact a piece of legislation that would prove to be unwise, should not deter us from discharging our obligations, and discharging them now. But why borrow trouble? Let us not cross any bridges until we have at least come in sight of them. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." For reasons stated I voted against the adoption of the rule.

And then when the original bill came before this House for the first time, I consoled myself with the thought that I had done my level best to prevent that nefarious union—this union that could only result in the birth of twin States, even though the advent of one should be so extremely premature as to entitle its arrival to a more accurate and descriptive appellation—and having done my best in a preventive way, I was next forced to the unpleasant alternative of choosing between two evils—that of denying a positive and altogether too long delayed right of statehood to Indian Territory and Oklahoma, or else force upon Arizona the uninvited embraces of an alien and uncongenial, not to say anything about unlovable, neighbor. All things being equal I would have considered it my duty to vote against the passage of the bill, but there are so many more people to suffer for want of statehood in the first-named Territories than there are now in Arizona to suffer by reason of enforced statehood that I finally chose what I considered the lesser of two evils, and hence voted for the bill.

But to-day we are face to face with a new order of things. "The best laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft a-gley." The bill passed by this House did not receive the enthusiastic approval of the Senate, nor did its terms measure up to the requirements and demands of the people. That measure was not right when it left this body. It has been taken by another body, corrected, perfected, and passed by it, and returned here for our concurrence. The opportunity is now presented to us to correct our former blunder. The case is before us as on a motion for a rehearing—a very fortunate thing for us. It does seem that there is something in that old adage that "God takes care of fools and children," for the error committed by us having been pointed out, it is not yet too late, and indeed the opportunity is now afforded us to make the much needed correction.

Oh, why do you wait, dear brothers?
Oh, why do you tarry so long?

Why not come in out of the brush of error and defeat and do our duty, our whole duty by these people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and give them statehood? Let us concur in the Senate amendment, and concur now. To longer delay is only to invite further criticism. Every hour we delay this matter will only add to the humiliation of our past error, the humiliation of continued defeat. We all know down deep in our hearts that the Senate bill, so far as the one State feature is concerned, will become law, or else no statehood at all.

You ask me why the Senate bill will pass or none? I will tell you. Because that body, strange as it may seem to some, is absolutely right on this proposition. They have discussed it, they have deliberated upon it, and they have spoken in no uncertain tones their conclusion. The Senate has the people of this country with them on this proposition, a fact worthy of note and consideration. It has from four to six years of service ahead for two-thirds of its Members, and thus securely intrenched behind all the essential fortifications, why should it yield its present position to an assaulting column unarmed for either offense or defense, and every soldier of our band, including the old General himself, liable to receive his discharge within the next few months.

It is all nonsense to say that the Senate will recede. They will do no such thing. It will be easier and much less expensive to vote to concur in that part of the Senate amendment which strikes out all reference to New Mexico and Arizona that to delay this matter indefinitely and have to include in our expense bill an additional outlay for materials with which to dissolve our irritated and inflamed, if not wounded, pride.

And why should New Mexico and Arizona be united? There is no reason on earth for it. New Mexico alone has 122,460 square miles of land surface. All New England, with her six States and twelve United States Senators, has but 61,973 square miles of land surface. New Mexico and Arizona combined have 235,380 square miles of land surface—more than any other State in the Union, except Texas. California, the second State in size, has 155,980 square miles of land surface, yet with Arizona and New Mexico combined into one State you will have an area in which you can place the entire State of California, the entire New England States, Delaware, and New Jersey; have land enought to make another New Jersey and still have hundreds of square miles left. Oh, I hear some one say that this land out West is sandy and can never be cultivated. But such is not the case. The same argument was made against Kansas and Nebraska. Why, there are men here who have seen the old school geographies, which put that land now known as Kansas and Nebraska down on the map as the Great American Desert. And it was correctly described then, too. But that great Republican measure, introduced and pushed through Congress by the great Morrill, of Vermont, the homestead act, has given an opportunity to American pluck and manhood, and by the force of determination and never lessening industry the American farmer, the American homesteader, has pushed back that waste line of the Great American Desert until to-day it is playing hide and seek among the mountains of the far West. And that same pluck, that same determination, can and will transform those desert places of the far West into fertile fields and blossoming gardens. The United States census shows that Arizona during the last decade more than doubled her population. Oklahoma did even better than that, but no State in the Union did as well. The people of Arizona do not ask for statehood, but they do ask to be let alone. I think we should let them alone. I have faith in Arizona's future. I have faith in New Mexico's future. They can and will be developed into great States with great populations. I am surprised that the majority of my colleagues from Kansas and Nebraska should feel as they do toward these Territories and seek to combine them into one State, and that against their will. What has been done in Kansas and Nebraska can and will be done in Arizona and New Mexico. The latter Territories have this very important advantage, they have mineral wealth untold.

But I am still more surprised when these same Members vote to delay statehood for Oklahoma and Indian Territory. But why dwell longer on this painful subject. You have your minds made up and are determined to delay matters. You say your course will eventually bring in the new State of Oklahoma. I hope you are right in your belief. But I am in favor of bringing it in now. Vote to concur in the Senate amendment above indicated, and the forty-sixth State of the Union can be admitted at once. Add one more star to Uncle Sam's bejeweled headgear, and let it stand for the great and growing Commonwealth of Oklahoma. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time has been consumed by each side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has consumed nine minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consume some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, every consideration of propriety and orderly procedure requires the adoption of this rule and the reference of this bill to a committee of conference. This bill does not represent any hasty action on the part of the House, or on the part of the majority of the House. The bill was reported by a committee that had carefully considered it. The majority of the House, which is responsible for legislation here, and which never hesitates to assume that responsibility, went into conference to consider what should be done with the bill, and after due consideration it decided that the House ought to pass the bill and send it to the Senate for its concurrence. The House acted upon the recommendation of that majority, and passed the bill and sent it to the Senate for its concurrence. Now, if the Members of the House comprising that Republican majority which passed the bill have any convictions of their own, if they are actuated by what they believe to be for the best interests of this great country, they ought to stand by those convictions and send the bill to conference. They should indicate by their action here that they are not to be turned aside or to be blown down by every breath of hot air that comes to us from the north end of the Capitol. [Applause and laughter.] The bill as it passed the House, embodied the convictions of the majority voting for it upon the question of statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. And nothing has occurred during the few weeks that have elapsed since the bill passed the House to change in any way the question of statehood for those two Territories. The character of the two Territories has not changed in this brief time. Their population has not materially increased. The sands are as parched, the mines as rich, the irrigated patches as green and fertile, as when we voted for double statehood. If, therefore, we who supported the bill a few weeks ago have any self-respect, if we have any regard for the dignity and prestige of the House, we will stand by this resolution and send the bill to conference.

Why, our distinguished friends on the other side, who are urging us now in the most earnest way to back down and concur in the amendment of the Senate cutting out statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, would be standing in their places jeering at us for our lack of stability, for our lack of leadership, for our lack of ability to resist the encroachments of the Senate if we were proposing to yield at this time and agree to the Senate amendment cutting out statehood for those two Territories. We are not determining to-day what will be the fate of the bill. We are deciding to-day that the bill, with the Senate amendments, shall take the usual course—shall be sent to a committee of conference. When that committee reports the House will have an opportunity to determine what its final position upon the propositions involved shall be. Now we are standing for our self-respect. We are standing for the dignity and integrity and prestige of the House. We are standing for the proposition that when, as the representatives of 80,000,000 people, we, after due consideration, deliberately crystallize our convictions and send to the Senate for concurrence a bill embodying those convictions, we are not to be expected to surrender to or adopt the suggestions of that great body until we have had an opportunity to meet it in conference and to satisfy it, if possible, that we, and not it, are right.

It is a matter of history that in the Fifty-seventh Congress the House considered this very matter, and finally sent to the Senate for concurrence a bill creating four States out of these four Territories. You remember what became of that bill. You recall how the Senate so amended it as to provide for the very double statehood for which the House is struggling in its efforts to pass this bill. It is a further matter of history that in the Fifty-eighth Congress the House, after reflecting upon the course taken by the Senate in the preceding Congress, and after many personal interviews with many of the members of the Senate, passed a bill providing for the same double statehood for which the Senate had stood in the preceding Congress. That bill failed to receive the approval of the Senate. But we were assured that the failure was due to accident. Then at the opening of this Fifty-ninth Congress, after listening to the recommendation of President Roosevelt indorsing the double statehood proposition, this bill was passed and sent to the Senate for its concurrence. The propositions involved in this bill, therefore, are not new to the Congress. Each of the coordinate branches of the Congress has expressed its views upon these propositions. Now, let us send the bill to conference. And let us send it with sufficient momentum to impress upon the other coordinate branch of Congress that in passing the bill the House stood for its convictions. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. SIBLEY.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be from all sections of the country a universal desire that Oklahoma shall receive that to which she is entitled, namely, statehood. There seems to be but one way that Oklahoma can secure statehood and that is by sending this bill to conference. [Applause.] I suppose that there is not a Member here who has not received letters or telegrams urging him in behalf of justice to give Oklahoma statehood. Now, I want to see Oklahoma have statehood, and take the floor simply to say to those people who are sending telegrams to me and to other Members of this body that those telegrams should be directed to the gentlemen sitting at the other end of this Capitol. Let those telegrams go to the Senators. We have passed through this House a measure which gives Oklahoma statehood and which confers upon Arizona and New Mexico statehood. Therefore I am sure that they are wasting their money in telegraphic tolls in asking us to recede. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote against this rule, and I do so because it is an innovation on the practices of the House, and intended to prevent this body from expressing itself fully and freely. The usual practice, as we all know, is when a House bill comes back with Senate amendments for the chairman to move concurrence or nonconcurrence. Often many amendments are concurred in and others are nonconcurred in and then a conference is asked for. In this case, Mr. Speaker, the House is denied the privilege of the ordinary motion to concur in the Senate amendments, which would end the whole proposition and admit Oklahoma and Indian Territory. Now, we have had some experience with this same proposition before in sending a bill to a committee of conference. It is a good burying ground. This same bill sent there last Congress never came back. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will appear before this Congress and that this body will have an opportunity to express itself intelligently on these amendments, but I make this prediction now, and I believe that if this rule is adopted it ends the whole proposition and we will not have an opportunity to vote upon it again this session. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consume some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. I wish the gentleman now to use all of his time, because I prefer to reserve the remainder of mine. I have only twelve minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he is going to consume all the balance of his time in one speech or not?

Mr. DALZELL. No; I am not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the gentleman use some part of his time now.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the dictatorial manner by which the representative of the minority on this floor undertakes to perform upon the discretion of those on this side of the House is significant of the condition we are in. A solid Democratic vote, regardless of every consideration, apparently, undertakes to not only agitate this side of the House, but dictate the time and manner in which we shall present the affirmative of a question with which we are charged and which the other side of the House is charged with no duty except to follow. It is a most remarkable situation. It indicates that arrogant dictatorial spirit that undertakes to misrepresent purposes and disposition. Now, I want to reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin in the speech he made. What warrant has he to impugn the honor and integrity of the majority on this floor? What warrant has he to say that a proposition sent by a majority of this House to a conference is to be buried? Has there been any effort to bury anything during the progress of this contention? The majority of the House of Representatives have been called together time after time and the course of events have been conducted by the will of that majority. The majority has grown in the conference. Conference after conference has been held and the same expression of opinion has been given, and we are standing exactly by the wish of the majority of the House. I do not impugn any man's motive who feels he is bound at this particular moment of time to break asunder from the control of the majority and vote in favor of some amendment—I do not know what—but I do stand for the orderly procedure of this bill. We are doing just exactly what we do under all circumstances almost. There has not been an appropriation bill passed in this House of any considerable importance in years gone by that has not taken exactly the course that this bill is taking now. It is sent to a conference. The Senate has amended their bill. We know nothing about the spirit with which it has been done, but it has made an important amendment to the House bill.

Now, what is this vote? This vote is to say to the Senate, "We desire to consult with you now about what is to be done in regard to these differences of opinion," and that is all there is involved in here. The time may come when more than that will be made an issue upon this particular bill, but at the present time we stand simply in favor of an orderly procedure, as the gentleman from Vermont has very well said. The other side—a dictatorial Democratic side—is that something different and otherwise than the ordinary rules shall be done, because, forsooth, a solid Democratic vote is in favor of it. If the Republican House desire to make themselves felt upon legislation of the Fifty-ninth Congress they will have to stand together and demand recognition at the hand of whoever may contest, but it will be a bad day for Republican domination in this House when the gentleman from Mississippi is allowed to crack his party whip about his own side of the House and then seek to disorganize and break up the Republican side of the House. Nothing is going to be concluded by this vote; the bill is to go to conference. I have yet to have heard before that an important bill was ever smothered in conference, and it would be perfectly fair for the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he knows of any such bill, to tell us when it was and under what circumstances.

Mr. BABCOCK. This very same bill in the last Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all.

Mr. BABCOCK. Was it ever reported back to the House after conference?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not because of any refusal upon the part of the House to have a report made.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is out of the hands of the House when in conference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When final disagreement was inevitable and both Houses stood in opposition to each other, as a matter of course there can be no report made. There was no report ready and there could be no report. The gentleman talks about an organized purpose here and makes a prediction. Well, my prediction is that the gentleman is mistaken in his proposition.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do say that the bill in the last Congress went to conference and stayed there.

Mr. DALZELL. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I propose to use my seven minutes after he is through on his side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, that remark is unnecessary. If the gentleman had waited a minute, he could have relied on the gentleman from Mississippi doing what was fair. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, if there is any gentleman in this Chamber who is opposed to the admission of Oklahoma, I pause here to give him an opportunity to say so now; and if he does not, I will ask him forever after to hold his peace. If we are all in favor of admitting Oklahoma—and you say it is one of the Administration measures—and you have an opportunity to do it now in ten minutes, why do you not get busy and admit Oklahoma, and not hitch it up with some other proposition that is not an Administration measure? [Loud applause.] The President has not asked us to include four Territories in one bill. If we have to hitch up——

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BEDE. I will, if the gentleman will take it out of his own time, but I do not yield for the gentleman to take it out of my time.

Mr. HAMILTON. I can not do that.

Mr. BEDE. Hitching up Oklahoma with Arizona and New Mexico is about like the way Noah put the menagerie into the ark when he numbered the animals two by two, the elephant and the kangaroo. [Laughter.] It is about time we get down to business and do things right and legislate on one question at a time. When I think of the proposition of hitching up New Mexico and Arizona I am reminded of the two Mormon boys who went to an eastern State to school. They gave the same family name, and the teacher said, "You are brothers, are you?" and they said, "Yes." They gave their ages the same, and the teacher said, "You are twins, are you?" They said, "Yes; on our father's side." [Laughter.] So Arizona and New Mexico are twins on the father's side. They both came from Mexico, but they had different mothers, and they have learned different languages and have different institutions. It is an insult to both of them to hitch them up together and force them in against their will, and an insult to Oklahoma, with her 2,000,000 population, to hitch her up to these Territories jointly or severally in this bill.

You say we are against the Administration. I am not against the Administration. I am with the Administration on everything except this bill and the wife-beating bill. [Laughter.]

In his message a year ago the President gave eight lines advocating the whipping post for the wife beater, and this year he gave us thirteen lines for the admission of these four Territories. Which is the Administration measure? Some of the leaders induce the President to put in his message a few lines favoring their kind of statehood, and then "point with pride" and cry aloud that we are opposing the Administration if we do not stand for it. On such minor matters I must guide myself.

I like the President. I like him because he is enlisted in a great work; he is in the midst of great deeds; he is intrenched with high resolves—a lofty purpose at every outpost—while his pavilion round about him is a nation's regard.

But I like him best because he permitted a Member of this House to break into his private home without sounding an alarm. I like him because when he got ready to give his daughter away he gave her to a real American, in every way worthy of the gift, and not to some degenerate prince, unappreciative of our institutions. [Applause.] I like him because when he gave her away he gave her to a Member of the House of action and correction at this end of the Capitol, and not to the House of detention at the other. [Applause.]

But the Senate has acted. It has done what the President urged us to do—to admit Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as one State; and in ten minutes we can make those Territories a State. The question is, Will we do it? Are you willing to do part of what the President recommended, when you know that you can not do all that he recommended? Ah! You throw a lot of criticism at the Senate. I wish to go on record as saying that never in the history of the United States have we had so able a Senate as we have to-day; never. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I have been granted one minute more. They talk about a Senator of the United States holding up the whole country. We have a strong man in the House who can hold up 100,000 square miles more than anybody in the Senate. [Laughter.] This time the Senate has done something, and it has done the right thing. If we are looking for a quarrel with the Senate, let us quarrel with it when the Senate is wrong and we are right. Let us not quarrel with it when we are wrong and it is right. I appeal to every man who stands for justice and fairness to vote against this resolution, and let us get to this business on its merits, which we are refused the opportunity to do under the special rule now offered to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. How much time has this side left?

The SPEAKER. Three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield those three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, in the very short time that I have of course I could not discuss the beauties or the iniquities of this rule. The plain proposition presented to us, and upon which we are to vote, is, Shall we admit Oklahoma and the Indian Territory to statehood, or shall we retire them to the conference committee? There is nobody in this House and nobody in the other House, nobody, so far as I know, in the country, who openly opposes the admission of the Indian Territory and Oklahoma to statehood; but it is very evident that there are a good many here and a good many elsewhere who secretly and hypocritically oppose that admission. There are officeholders down there who are not in favor of statehood. There are persons here and elsewhere who have friends and perhaps relationships closer than friendships down there. There are persons who profit by this chaotic condition which they would perpetuate. There are persons who are making money out of keeping the Indian Territory and Oklahoma in the condition in which they are. The honest citizenship of both Territories is overwhelmingly in favor of admission to statehood. The honest citizenship of the United States is overwhelmingly in favor of admitting those Territories to statehood. Nothing but what you choose to call "politics," nothing that is American, nothing that has reason or right to stand upon, opposes it. A vote for this rule is distinctly, directly, positively, knowingly a vote to keep Oklahoma and the Indian Territory out of the Union. [Applause.] Cast that vote if you please, but in casting it know what you do. Know that others know what you do. [Applause.] A vote against this rule is a vote to submit to this House the question of concurrence to the Senate amendment, the adoption of which by this House will send to the President a bill to admit Oklahoma and the Indian Territory to statehood. Deny by your superior voting power, if you choose, to two millions of American citizens down there, not merely the privilege but the absolute right of admission to statehood; but when you do it, take the responsibility for it. Do not attempt elsewhere, as you seem to be attempting here, to delude anybody into the belief that principle or right or precedents or justice or any other thing that you can stand upon—that can be explained, declared, or defended—can justify your action. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest, as the House always does, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE], and he was very entertaining, as he always is. I listened to the speech of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], which I have so often heard, as to the iniquities of the rules of this House; but after all it seems to me that the Members of the House want to know just what is involved in this vote, and I propose to tell them in a few moments in a plain, simple way. There is nothing extraordinary involved in this proceeding, either from a parliamentary point of view or from any other point of view. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few days ago put into the RECORD a brief as to the parliamentary situation which entirely misrepresented the parliamentary situation. He cited a precedent established in the Forty-eighth Congress where a bill was taken from the Speaker's table, but taken from the Speaker's table under a rule which prevailed in the Forty-eighth Congress and does not prevail in this Congress. In the Forty-eighth Congress the Speaker's table was one of the calendars of the House and could be approached by a motion as any other calendar could be approached. Under our rules any bill with an amendment calling for an appropriation, unless by unanimous consent, must go to the committee that originated the bill by way of the Speaker's table, so that there is nothing unusual in this situation so far as that is concerned.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] says that you are deprived of the right to concur in the Senate amendments. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], if he knows anything about the rules of this House, knows that no such concurrence is possible or ever was possible save by unanimous consent, and that is absolutely out of the question in the present situation. Now, instead of proceeding in an unusual and extraordinary way, the House is proceeding to-day in a decent and orderly way, following the usual means pursued of bringing together the two Houses to settle their differences.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. BEDE. Does the gentleman deny that if the Speaker of the House would give his consent that we could get unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. DALZELL. I think so; yes.

Mr. BEDE. I think not.

Mr. DALZELL. I think the gentleman would not get unanimous consent as long as I had a voice. Now, there is nothing extraordinary in the parliamentary proceeding at all. It is not the advocates of the House measure, but the opponents of the House measure who are seeking to resort to extraordinary tactics. The customary way when the Senate sends a House bill back to the House with disagreement and with amendments thereto is for the House to seek a conference, a full and free conference, with the Senate, and thereby seek an adjustment of the differences. The gentlemen who are opposing the House bill would have us, instead of going to a full and free conference where we might adjust our differences, adopt without further parley the Senate bill as against the House bill. Will anyone show me any good reason why the House should abandon its policy and accept the Senate policy without even the formality of a conference—why we should lower our flag and enlist under the Senate flag? The Senate of the United States is not dealing out any such courtesy to us. There are bills over there on important subjects, sent from the House, that are meeting with scant courtesy. There will be between this and the adjournment of this session many opportunities for negotiation with the Senate upon matters in which the House is interested, and it seems to me becoming in us not to announce in advance a policy of surrender, but to stand by our guns. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, let me refer to a few facts. In the Fifty-eighth Congress the Republican House of Representatives passed a bill admitting Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State and Arizona and New Mexico as another State. The President of the United States, adopting the policy of a Republican House, indorsed that policy and recommended its adoption in his message. The Republican House of the Fifty-ninth Congress, this House, adopted precisely the same measure that was adopted by the Republican House in the last Congress, and the Senate demurs to our policy. What is it now that I am asking you to do? Nothing unusual. I am asking you to stand by the Republican measure of the Fifty-eighth Congress. I am asking you to stand by the indorsement and recommendation of your own Republican President. I am asking you to stand by the policy of the House of this Fifty-ninth Congress. I am asking you to stand by your own personal honor and dignity and the honor and dignity and independence of the House of Representatives intrusted by the people to your keeping. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I think we better save the time of the House and have the yeas and nays now. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 175, nays 156, answered "present" 6, not voting 46, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

Until further notice:

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. VAN DUZER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees. The Clerk will report the names of the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BRICK, and Mr. MOON of Tennessee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer a motion which is right here and now in order.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of offering a motion which is here and now in order.

The SPEAKER. If so it will here and now be considered. [Applause and laughter.] The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Moves to instruct the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives to agree to the amendment of the Senate striking the provision admitting Arizona and New Mexico out of the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, now I wish to be heard upon the point of order. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. One moment. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. PAYNE. I rose to make the point of order, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania made it. I make the point that the House having adopted the resolution sending the bill to a free and full conference, and the conferees having already been appointed, this resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi through courtesy upon the point of order, although the Chair is prepared to rule in the line of precedents upon this matter that are as strong as they can be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am profoundly grateful to the Chair for the courtesy of the Chair; and when I get through arguing the point of order the country will be profoundly grateful to the Speaker for his sense of justice, to be shown by his ruling that the motion is in order. I ask the Chair to listen respectfully and seriously to the reasons which I have to give why the motion sent up is in order. I ask the Chair to dismiss from his mind, as far as he can, every consideration that conflicts with an impartial hearing, in order to arrive at a just conclusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi briefly. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have long since learned to be thankful for "brief" favors, even. Now, the adoption of this resolution has a certain effect. The effect of its adoption is to send this bill to conference, and that is all of the effect of the adoption of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman, upon that point, listen to the concluding words of the order that has been adopted by the House? "And the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees," which the Speaker has done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I had read that, and for that very reason I made the motion between the time of the announcement of the vote and the appointment of the conferees.

The SPEAKER. As a question of fact, the gentleman did not have the floor. The Chair was in the performance of his duty, under the direction of the resolution, and the gentleman did not have the floor for the purpose, and did not make the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I heard the names announced.

The SPEAKER. And could not under the operation of the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will listen to me; the Chair has so frequently outdebated me and argued me while on the floor, I thought I had an opportunity to do the arguing myself once in a while, when he was in the chair, and to submit this question to him as a judge and not as a debater upon the other side. The names of the conferees have not been announced to the House, and therefore, the conferees not having been appointed until now——

Mr. HAMILTON. The names have been announced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Speaker has not announced the names of the conferees as yet, and as usual in almost every case before the conferees are appointed, the Speaker says he will appoint the conferees now.

The SPEAKER. Let us get at the question of facts. On the contrary, the conferees have been announced.

Mr. HAMILTON. Everybody around here heard the names of the conferees announced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I was upon my feet to the very best of the capacity of my lungs claiming the attention of the Speaker before the announcement of the conferees, and the Speaker must have heard me, and when the Speaker recognized me at all his recognition related back to the time when I claimed his recognition.

Mr. DALZELL. He did not recognize you at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the ordinary practice of the House. It may be as the Speaker said, that the Clerk had read the names of the conferees to the House. If so, I confess I did not hear them. Others around me say they did not. Of course if it is a fact it is a fact, and the Speaker's word is sufficient for me, even if others did not hear it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, passing that point, when a recognition is granted, it is a recognition from the time that the recognition was claimed, and when this recognition was claimed, I was upon my feet struggling with all the vociferousness of any note of my poor lungs alone to obtain that recognition at the proper time, and I want to read a couple of authorities. The effect, as I understand, now is that this resolution puts this matter in conference.

I read from the Manual, as follows:

It is in order to instruct conferees, and the resolution of instruction should be offered after the House has voted to insist and ask a conference, and before the conferees have been appointed.

That refers to section 1379, Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives, first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, RECORD, page 7404, and other authorities which the Speaker will there find. Now, "the House having instructed its conferees, in the first instance, should have to inform the Senate by message of the instruction. The latter body objected to the instruction, and to the transmission of them by message." That would seem at first blush to be somewhat the other way. That went to the Senate upon a motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] of this body to instruct the conferees after a matter had been voted to conference and before the conferees were appointed. After the motion had been made upon this floor to disagree and go to a conference and before the conferees were actually appointed the motion was made by the gentleman from Alabama, and the Speaker of the House at that time ruled that was in order. The Senate, the rebel against which we are kicking this morning, resisted that, but the authority is plain, so far as House action is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

The resolution adopted by the House a short time ago is the rule of the House and binding on the House, and on the Speaker as the presiding officer of the House. It begins "Resolved," etc., and the conclusion of the rule is "And the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees." That binds the House; that binds the Speaker, and under a rule adopted by the majority it binds the gentleman from Mississippi as well, whatever may have been his opinion or that of the minority of the House as to the propriety of the adoption of the rule. The Chair will not take much of time in referring to authorities, but will ask the Clerk to read a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, when he was Speaker, that follows the ruling in such cases.

The Clerk read as follows:

The gentleman from Michigan has raised the point of order that the resolution can not be acted on because the subject is not before the House. The House having disposed of it by further insisting upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and requesting a conference, and the managers of the conference having been appointed on the part of the House, theoretically, of course, the matter has gone to the Senate and is not in the House.

Therefore the Speaker did not entertain the motion of instruction.

The SPEAKER. That is under the ordinary rules of the House. In their operation the motion to instruct conferees always follows after the motion to disagree with the Senate and before the appointment of the conferees. In the case upon which Speaker Carlisle ruled that was under the ordinary rules of the House. The House had disagreed to the Senate amendments and the conferees had been appointed. Immediately thereafter the Member from Michigan moved the instruction, and Speaker Carlisle, in the opinion which the Chair has had read to the House, held the motion out of order; but the Chair again calls the attention of the House to the fact that this is a proceeding under his rule, which not only by virtue of its adoption nonconcurs in every one of the forty amendments to the bill and asks a conference, but in the language of the rule—binds the Speaker. The conferees were appointed, and, in the language of Speaker Carlisle, theoretically at least, the House has not the bill; it has gone to the Senate, and therefore, under the provision of the special order, the Chair sustains the point of order.

And the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees—

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of appealing from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. From the ruling of the Chair the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] appeals.

Mr. DALZELL. And I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. DALZELL; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 146, noes 91.

Accordingly the appeal was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw Senate bills 134 and 1669 and have them recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart for the consideration of war claims, I move to substitute Friday of next week, the 30th of this month.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] moves that Friday of next week be substituted for to-day for the special order for the consideration of war claims. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $50,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for fifteen minutes instead of five.

Mr. LITTAUER. In connection with this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall speak on this bill and on other matters.

Mr. LITTAUER. Can you not defer it? This bill has been held along now for so many days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I do not desire to defer it.

Mr. LITTAUER. I desire very much to go ahead with the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is a general latitude allowed in the debate, and if the gentleman does not wish it he can raise the point of order. I make the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The Public Printer shall submit for the fiscal year 1907, and annually thereafter, estimates for all clerks and other employees, additional to the foregoing, who are required in the executive or administrative offices of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I notice that the paragraph just read provides that the Public Printer shall submit for the fiscal year 1907, and annually thereafter, estimates, etc. When is he to submit those estimates?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the annual estimates which, according to law, are submitted to the Houses of Congress on the first Monday in December of each year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has he ever been before required to submit that?

Mr. LITTAUER. He never has been as to clerks employed in the administrative offices in addition to the seven above specified.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would it be implied that he must submit that on the first Monday of December?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the law specifically requires all officers to submit estimates on or before the first Monday of December, and this provision requires the Public Printer to submit an estimate for his entire administrative force, and of course he must submit it in accordance with the law requiring other Departments to submit estimates.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman call the Public Printing Office a Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; it is an independent office.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then would a statute merely requiring a "Department" to submit an estimate at a certain time compel also the Public Printer to submit an estimate at the same time?

Mr. LITTAUER. Unless I am mistaken, the statute requires that all Government officers shall submit their annual estimates on the first Monday in December. The annual estimates for the Public Printer, except this small force, have been considered in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But there is a difference between a statute requiring a Department to submit an estimate and a statute drawn like this, which simply requires a bureau chief to submit one.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the Public Printer is subordinate to no Department; he is an independent force or office.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, to whom would he submit this report?

Mr. LITTAUER. To Congress. He reports directly to Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there any general statute which provides that all reports of estimates by bureau chiefs directly to Congress shall be made at a certain time?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought the gentleman stated that the requirements relate to reports of estimates by Department chiefs.

Mr. TAWNEY. I may have said Departments; but all officers, heads of Departments or otherwise, are required to submit annual estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury first, and then the law requires the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit them to Congress on or before the first Monday in December of each year.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would state to the gentleman also that the Public Printer submits estimates each year according to the law, and the object of this provision is that he should submit specific estimates for all clerks and other employees required in the executive or administrative offices of the Public Printer.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. The gentleman from New York said a moment ago that under this particular paragraph the Public Printer would submit these estimates to Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Minnesota has just said that there is a general statute which requires bureau chiefs to submit their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. Heads of Departments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, heads of Departments.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the method of transmission to Congress is through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the Public Printer is an independent office, subject to no Department, and therefore a statute which merely requires "Department" chiefs to submit estimates at a certain time would not at all fix a definite time for the submitting of estimates by the Public Printer.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the law declares all officers of the Government should submit estimates, whether they be Department chiefs or otherwise. The Public Printer does now submit estimates, but we desire to have these estimates in a specific shape, especially as refers to his clerks and administrative employees. The gentleman will readily recognize that a force of seven clerks is not the entire executive force in connection with the Public Printer's office. We sought this year to find out whether we could not, in view of much that is gone on in investigation in connection with the public printing, take up the entire executive force specifically.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me? The object of the paragraph, of course, I understand and deem commendable. The only point I sought to raise was this, whether under this particular paragraph there was a time definitely fixed for the submission of estimates by the Public Printer.

Mr. LITTAUER. The law declares that on or before the 15th day of October these estimates must be forwarded by the officers of the Government to the Secretary of the Treasury, who transmits them to Congress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the Secretary sends a printed copy to each Congressman.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes, sir; on the assembling of Congress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I remember having received one in the mails at the beginning of this Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state, Mr. Chairman, for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the Public Printer is to-day submitting his estimates through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, for all the money that he deems necessary to conduct the office of Public Printer, or Government Printing Office. Now, all of his estimates and all of the appropriations for his department to-day, except a few executive clerks carried in the legislative bill, are carried in the sundry civil bill, and it is in connection with the preparation of the sundry civil bill that his estimates are now to be considered for the next fiscal year. Now, then, we ask him to submit a detailed statement with respect to all classes of employees in connection with the executive department of the Printing Office, and instead of carrying them in a lump sum, as heretofore, under the sundry civil appropriation bill, he will have to specify particularly all the clerks, the salaries paid to all the clerks, and that will afford Congress an opportunity to review these salaries and reduce them if in the judgment of Congress they should be reduced. It is simply a change in the form of submitting the estimates, and instead of being in a lump form carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill he will hereafter submit estimates in detail as to the executive force. The rest of the force will be carried in the sundry civil bill as heretofore.

The Clerk read as follows:

Order (purchasing): For chief of division, $2,500; assistant, $1,500; assistant, $1,200; three assistants, at $900 each; two assistants, at $720 each; two assistants, at $600 each; assistant, $520; and two messenger boys, at $360 each; in all, $11,780.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the last word, so as to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge as to the object of this purchasing agent having a force of eleven clerks drawing salaries; and I would like to know what they do?

Mr. LITTAUER. The chief of the order division has in charge the recording and all the work in connection with the purchase of books and the correspondence attending purchases from appropriations, amounting to a total of nearly $100,000. In addition thereto this division has charge of receiving all additions to the Library, from whatever source they may come, from the operation of the copyright law or from gifts, exchanges, or otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is another provision in the bill for the copyright force which carries about $75,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. That appropriation is to take care of the business under the copyright law itself, and to make the proper records in connection with the granting of copyrights. This order division of the Library is in charge of all accessions to the Library proper, whether by purchase or by gift, or through the operation of the copyright law. As the gentleman knows, the Library receives two copies of everything that is copyrighted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does not the gentleman think that for purchases amounting to $100,000, $11,000 for clerks to make these purchases rather exorbitant?

Mr. LITTAUER. I did at first think so; but if the gentleman will turn to page 74 of the hearings he will find a question as to this expense was put to the Librarian of Congress, and his answer was very plain. He said:

> It has to do not merely with purchases, but with all material that comes into the Library proper, from whatever source—for instance, from copyrights, so far as copyright deposits are drawn on by the Library proper. They have to be passed through the order division and entered there and stamped there. Material coming by gift and exchange also passes through it.

The Librarian then proceeds to comment on the character of work extending to the purchase of $98,000 worth of books, annually.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment. I wanted information. I thought the amount rather large.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Periodical (including evening service): For chief of division, $2,000; chief assistant, $1,500; two assistants, at $900 each; stenographer and typewriter, $900; three assistants, at $720 each; two messenger boys, at $360 each; for arrears of sorting and collating and to enable periodical reading room to be open in the evenings, two assistants, at $720 each; in all, $10,520.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the provision for an additional stenographer and typewriter, in line 21, page 26. I want to know why they want this stenographer.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Do you think this typewriter is necessary, or do you know anything about it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am asking the gentleman in charge of the bill about it.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask the gentleman what his point of order is?

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. The point of order I make is that there is no provision for the employment of that clerk. There is no provision in existing law nor in the pervious appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What law?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not in the previous appropriation bills. This is an increase in the force by the provision made in this bill for a stenographer and typewriter at $900. It is also subject to the point of order that there is no provision of law authorizing it. It is making law—creating an office in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Congressional reference library: For custodian, $1,500; assistant, $1,200; assistant, $900; assistant, $720; two messenger boys, at $360 each; in all, $5,040.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to inquire of the gentleman having this bill in charge why the necessity of so many employees in the Congressional reading room. I want to say to the gentleman that I happen to reside very close to the Congressional Library. I frequently visit the rooms prepared for Representatives in Congress, and I have never seen but two men there. They are always there. This bill carries about half a dozen employees, and there are but two men there.

Mr. LITTAUER. The Librarian states that there are three employees in charge of the branch library on the floor of this House and three who are assigned to the care of the Congressional rooms at the Library. Three in both places—three there and three here.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all right. I just wanted the information. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he can inform the House as to the total cost of this institution that we call the Congressional Library?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think that I can. The total cost of the Library can be divided into five chief items. First, the cost of the Library proper, its administration, and the purchase of books, $442,460. Next there is an annual appropriation of $40,000 for furniture and expenses in that line. For the maintenance and care of the building and grounds a total of $80,305 is appropriated, or was appropriated last year, and in addition thereto $32,500 for fuel, lights, and expenditures under similar heads.

That makes a total of $595,265 carried in this bill, in addition, to which, I believe, the sundry civil bill of last year carried an allowance of $185,000 for printing and binding. That brings the total to about $787,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. And if you include the interest on the plant, what would then be the total cost of this Library to the American people?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have never made such a computation of the total cost of this Library.

Mr. HEPBURN. Something over a million dollars a year, would it not be, including the interest on the plant?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, if the total cost of the building and like matters were to be considered, I do not know what that would amount to. But, Mr. Chairman, we all recognize that our Library is an expensive institution. Yet I believe that the appropriations for this purpose are approved by the enlightened people of the United States, and that they are willing to stand this large expenditure for the maintenance and expansion of this great National Library, housed in that most magnificent yet suitable building.

Your committee recognized that there was criticism and some rumors afloat regarding the conduct of the administration of this Library and its great cost, and consequently we held very thorough and extended hearings, which have been published in this pamphlet of over a hundred pages that I hold in my hand, now at the service of the Members of this House.

The Library of Congress is not particularly a library of Congress; it is the great national institution, reflecting great credit upon the Federal Government. It stands for our progress and for our power and for our intellectual development. It is the great American library of research and investigation, and all those who work there in the investigation of subjects in which they are interested are enthusiastic as to its opportunities, as to the way they are treated, and the courtesy extended to them, and the sensible helpfulness whereby they are enabled to take advantage of its unrivalled opportunities. The Library performs a necessary service for the investigator, and through him spreads knowledge throughout the country. It is a vast storehouse of knowledge and information. It performs a great service in many varied lines. Our copyright office is there, which protects the intellectual property of our citizens. It prepares and distributes historical information, particularly on matters connected with American history. Its maps are used in our law courts for the determination of boundaries, and were of essential aid in the determination of Alaskan boundaries. Its system of card-catalogue distribution is extended to over 700 libraries.

The expenditure of $780,000 seemed to us to be a very great one, which led to careful investigation. The force connected with the institution is appointed without reference to civil-service rules. We made a thorough examination into how that force was appointed and how promotions took place in the force, and the general condition of the administration. We found that out of some 236 appointments made by the present Librarian more than three-quarters of them, 167 in number, were appointed without even a letter of recommendation from either a Senator or a Representative.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask from what States they were appointed, and did you find out how many were indorsed by two certain Senators from the New England States?

Mr. LITTAUER. We went into the matter thoroughly. We did not go into the matter of how many were indorsed by any particular Senator, but over three-quarters of all who work there, appointed by the present Librarian, were appointed without any reference to any recommendation either by a Member of this House or a member of the other body.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman tell us how he ascertained that fact as to these recommendations?

Mr. LITTAUER. By the statement of the Librarian and the record of appointments submitted to us. In this book of hearings a very complete statement of all the employees in the Library at this time can be found. As far as our investigations went, we felt that the Library was being conducted in an able, efficient, and conscientious manner, and that the result was that its great accumulations were being intelligently handled for their best utilization.

Now, as long as I am on my feet, I want to comment on the seemingly great cost of the care and custody of the building. Everyone who visits the Library is delighted with the conditions in which they find that building preserved and maintained and with its cleanliness. Not only is the beauty of the original structure preserved, but all the accessories connected with the development of the Library are properly maintained. This care is in the charge of a man who was connected with the building of the Library, who is one of the most praiseworthy public officials, exceptionally capable in many lines; who not only performs the work that he is paid for as custodian of the building, but has found opportunities of gaining recompense in other lines. In fact, Congress——

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he thought in the mere inquiry I made, which he has construed into a criticism, that I had any purpose whatever in criticising the efficiency of the scrub women? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I thought the gentleman was looking higher up. [Laughter.] The efficiency of the scrub women——

Mr. HEPBURN. Is beyond compare.

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably so; and the efficiency of the care of the building, the custody and maintenance of the building, and the erection of its accessories is also beyond compare.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe the gentleman from New York has the floor in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield the time of the gentleman from Iowa to the gentleman from Wisconsin? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTAUER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from New York in commendation of the custodian of the Library building and grounds. The gentleman spoke not only of the custodian's efficiency, but of the fact that he has been enabled to earn money in addition to his salary as custodian. I want to ask the gentleman if it is a fact, as reported in the newspapers, that the custodian is of such high efficiency that he gets $5,000 a year—as much as a Senator or Representative in Congress—as custodian of the Library buildings and grounds, and at the same time $4,000 for going to Harrisburg and taking care of the construction of the Pennsylvania State capitol; that he also gets some pay—$2,000 a year, I believe—for taking care of the construction of the new Museum on the Mall; and that he also received a percentage, a very respectable sum, for superintending or assisting in the superintending of the construction of the New Willard Hotel? And all of this time receiving $5,000 a year for attending to his duties as custodian of the Library building and grounds?

Mr. LITTAUER. The facts are not exactly correct as stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, but in the main they would lead to a right impression. Let me say to the gentleman that this gentleman has been the custodian of the Library and has a salary of $5,000. He is the disbursing officer for all the Library in all of its activities.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many employees are there in the building?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the Library, 430. He is disbursing officer for the Library, and then by law he was designated as superintendent of construction of the new National Museum, and disbursing officer of that work also, for which he receives a salary of $2,000. He was designated so by law, and I take it for granted that no one would take the superintendence of construction of such a work, who had no other emolument from the Government, for $2,000 a year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not familiar with the statutes touching salaries, and would therefore like to ask the gentleman if there is any statute which prohibits an employee of the Government from receiving two salaries from the Government of the United States at the same time?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is; but this law expressly provides——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But you say this man receives two salaries from the Government besides superintending the construction of the building at Harrisburg and of buildings elsewhere?

Mr. LITTAUER. The sum that he receives from Harrisburg, or that he did receive as a consultant, is not received from the Federal Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think it is right for a Government employee in receipt of $7,000 a year—two salaries from the Government of the United States—to be permitted to go to Harrisburg and be enabled to cut under, if you choose, many men competent to attend to that work?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe there was any cutting under. In this case I think the eminent services of the gentleman were demanded by the State of Pennsylvania, and that he was requested to go there. He simply states that he goes there about once a month and it takes about one day of his time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For which he receives pay at the rate of $15 a day from the United States Government.

Mr. LITTAUER. At any rate, he so conducts his work here that no one can find fault with the work in charge of the laborers.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that the same gentleman whose name as assistant superintendent of construction is carved on the marble tablet in the Library above the names of the architects?

Mr. LITTAUER. I suppose it is, if that is the fact that it is there.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has the committee considered any alternative proposition upon which the Government can fasten in case of the natural or accidental death of this person? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; they thought the succession would be easily taken care of, but nevertheless the committee hopes his services may be retained to the Government for many years to come, for it believes they have been very eminent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman's committee, as the result of their investigations, recommended any legislation which would prevent the gentleman from receiving two salaries from the Government of the United States when he is also receiving another salary from the State government of Pennsylvania and compensation for working for private parties?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York permit me to answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will state that his (Col. Bernard R. Green's) services are dispensed with upon the building of the new capitol at Harrisburg, Pa., because that building is to all intents and purposes finished, and his services there are no longer necessary, nor is he now drawing any salary in connection therewith. But I will say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that his services there were most eminent, that they saved the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania many, many thousands of dollars, that we could not have obtained an expert equal to him in value and at the same time honest in watching all the details for the amount of money that I, with other members of that commission who employed him, were glad to pay. We sought his services. He did not seek us. He has served the State of Pennsylvania most eminently and properly.

Mr. BRICK. As I understand it, you were one of a board of five commissioners that were appointed to erect that new capitol?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. BRICK. I take it he was not what you call an assistant architect?

Mr. GRAHAM. He was a consulting engineer and an expert and authority on granite. That building is constructed of granite. It is a magnificent building, the finest State building in the United States, and completed at less cost than any other building in the United States of like character, a result mainly due to the eminent abilities of this gentleman who assisted the commission in preventing overcharges and graft. That is one of the few buildings in the United States which has been erected within the time and within the original appropriation and without scandal or graft connected therewith, just as was the Library here in the city of Washington, a record of which Pennsylvania is justly proud.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] if his reasoning applies also to the employment of this gentleman in superintending the construction of the New Willard Hotel and the Raleigh Hotel?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no knowledge of anything connected with that. I only speak from personal knowledge of the eminent services that this gentleman has rendered the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended so that he may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] to jump on me with all four hands and feet. I did not intend to criticise this institution at all. I did indulge in a little criticism a year ago and I find that I was taken up in the annual report of the Librarian, and I have been a little timid about making any suggestion. A year ago, in speaking of what I regarded as a wanton and useless and foolish expenditure of the public money in regard to this Library, I called attention to the entire number of books that had been taken from the shelves for the use of those who went to consult that Library, as reported by the Librarian. I did not assume to say that that measured the usefulness of the Library, but I did say that if that fact could be taken as a measure of its usefulness, then we ought to adopt some other method, because it costs more money to put into the hands of each one of the visitors to that Library who sought the books upon its shelves than it would have cost for Congress to have bought the books and made a present of them to those who inquired for them.

If that was a fair test, it cost more than $1 to hand a book to the inquirer that went to that Library. In the last annual report of the Librarian he refers to that fact, and he put into my mouth sentences that I did not use, refused to make use of the qualifying sentences that I did use, and then undertook to demolish the supposed argument that I made by showing the vast usefulness of the institution in other directions and in other ways than simply by the use of the books. Now, Mr. Chairman, I notice that in the report this year—or at least if it is there I have not been able to find it—that method of testing the usefulness and the cost to the public is taken away, for the report does not show the number of people who have been accommodated with the books of that Library. I am not one who wants to run amuck against the Library. I believe it is a great institution, I believe that its usefulness ought to be preserved to the American people, that it ought to be made more useful, but I submit it ought to be so made useful within the limitations of reasonable expenditure. Nearly $800,000 is an enormous sum for the people to pay for this institution, and if you calculate its cost, grounds and all, nearly $7,000,000, and add the interest on that vast sum—we are paying on some of our bonds, 4 per cent—then you find you have the wonderful total of nearly $1,000,000 to maintain a library. I think that some other method ought to be adopted, and if no other method can be adopted, then some other man ought to be put at the head of it. It is not enough to say that a man has been connected with this great institution and that great institution and this other great institution and therefore necessarily is the fit man for this responsible position. We want something more of practical results than this, and yet with this extraordinary expenditure, without recommendations in the way of economy, without a suggestion as to how this grand total can be made less, $90,000 are put into the hands of this gentleman, and I understand that he is ransacking the second-hand book stores of the world by communication and by his messengers to find books, books. What kind? What do the American people care for the curiosities in the bookbinder's art or for these old and musty tomes probably reprinted over and over again? What do we or the American people care for being the owners and custodians of this class of literary curiosity? I think that something ought to be done in order to curtail the wonderful expenditure that is imposed upon the American people.

I know with what delight we and our constitutents visit that building. It is a wonder, and I confess that I feel much of gratitude to the gentleman, Mr. Green, who has been referred to time and again for his participation in its construction. I think the American people owe him much for the skill that he has manifested, for his wonderful ability in assembling the talent that was necessary for the adornment of that great pile. I know that our people love to visit it and are proud to point to it as perhaps the finest specimen of architecture known to the world. But remember that that achievement, that the construction of that building and making it one of the wonders of architecture is something entirely beyond this man who is now charged with these vast expenditures and who is known as the "Librarian." He is entitled to none of that credit. He was not a participant in that class of labor; he did nothing to assemble the skilled artists who have made the building a thing of beauty, and this fact ought not to be lost sight of when we are discussing his qualifications for the position he is now in. He is responsible at least for the fact that no recommendations are made by the custodian of that Library and by the man who expends these vast sums in the direction of economy, and that is the criticism I desire to make.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to confess a partiality for the Library of Congress. Some of the pleasantest and most profitable hours I have ever enjoyed have been within its walls, and I am unwilling to listen to any strictures upon its management or any accusations of extravagance without a word in reply. It is maintained that Mr. Green, superintendent of the building, is receiving too high a salary or too many salaries. I would we had more public servants like Mr. Bernard R. Green. He has been forty-three years in the employ of this Government and on the whole roll we can not find a man who has been more efficient or faithful in the performance of his trust.

It is false economy to indulge in cheeseparing with the salaries of competent men. It is true Mr. Green receives $5,000 a year as superintendent of the Library building, $2,000 by special act of Congress for superintendence of the building of the National Museum, and then again as consulting engineer at Harrisburg and in other places, for a time not exceeding his annual leave, he has received further compensation. Now, I would be one of the last men on this floor to advocate a general rule under which a man in the employ of the Government may be employed outside, but this is an exceptional case. He has to do with construction and with improvements in the heating, wiring, and lighting of buildings, and it is exceedingly desirable that he should be in touch with all the methods that are in vogue elsewhere. Thus every hour he gives to the State capitol of Pennsylvania makes him more competent for the management of the Congressional Library. We certainly can not complain of the extra $2,000, because we ourselves passed that statute. He is a man who, as I know, is devoted to his work during the daytime and often until late at night. He had to do with the construction of the Washington Monument, with the examination of the Washington Aqueduct when graft had been detected there. He constructed one wing of the State, War, and Navy building, and it means something when you point to the fact that of the two wings of that building one wing was constructed by others and another was under his superintendence, and the wing constructed under his superintendence cost $1,459,000 less than the other. It is something to his credit also that this Congressional Library was finished within the estimate of $6,500,000, and within the time prescribed for its completion.

A report has been given a wide circulation that the custody, care, and maintenance of the Library building and grounds cost more than for this Capitol. I would it were so. The fact is that it costs just about three times as much for this building here as it does for the Congressional Library. Naturally it would cost more. There is perhaps a greater variety of expenditure. There is the occupancy of many committee rooms. This is an older building, and requires more repair and, in a way, a larger degree of attention from watchmen and others.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to file with my remarks a statement showing the comparative size and cost of maintaining the Library and the Capitol buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in his remarks a statement such as he has indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It seems to me that in making criticisms in regard to the expense for books people overlook the essential nature of this Library. It is not a circulatiag library at all. It is a reference library. It is like the British Museum, which costs for annual maintenance $636,000 a year, where wages are much cheaper than here, or the Bibliothèque Nationale, in Paris, and we should provide for it all the valuable books which may be useful. In the more than a million books there you will find a copy of the original folio edition of Shakespeare's works and numerous books from Thomas Jefferson's library, which not only have his bookmark, but thumb marks as well, and his notes written in the margin. It is far and away more valuable and complete than any library in the world of the same age. It has by far the best building. A reference library and a circulating library are very different in their essential requisites. One of the characters in The Rivals made the remark that "a circulatiag library in a community is an evergreen tree of diabolical knowledge."

I do not accept that as a proper characterization of a circulating library, but it is one where the demand for books is largely for fiction and reading that is sensational. But this is one in which are collected works of history, of art, and of geography, and in every branch in which the scholar or general reader may be interested. It is especially useful for research, and includes as well treasures of art and of architecture which will please the eye. We are prone here to strain out a gnat and swallow a camel, and that is what we are doing when we object to the sum of $780,000, which it has been stated is the annual cost of the Library. Bear in mind that this includes $182,000 for printing and binding, which are not maintenance and in large part are an addition; also that a portion of that amount is to furnish shelves, which are another addition to the permanent value of the library; $98,000 is for the acquisition of books, which increase the investment that the Government has there; about $70,000 is to take care of the copyright division, and yet the copyright fees collected and covered into the Treasury are considerably more than the amount appropriated for that division. There is a division which furnishes catalogue cards to other libraries. That is comparatively inexpensive, for the work of composition would be done in any event, and the cards are exceedingly valuable to the libraries of the country, although the very small charge for them more than covers the cost to the Library of Congress. Let us compare these expenses with the cost of maintaining a battle ship, estimated last year at $517,000 per annum, and we are building and maintaining a considerable number of them. Is it not for the benefit of this country to maintain this institution, even if it should cost a little more than the maintenance of a battle ship, when it stands for education, for art, and all that is best in modern civilization? It is called the "Library of Congress," and some say the name should be changed to the "National Library." For one, I want the name "Library of Congress" to remain, as a monument, one of the great monuments, to legislation by this Congress. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio has thrown any particular light upon the subject that I tried to bring to the attention of Congress. I do not want it understood that I am hostile to this institution. I do want it understood that I am hostile to what I regard as a wanton, flagrant, wasteful expenditure of money. The gentleman has suggested two reasons why this large expenditure was desirable. One was that one of the original books of Shakespeare has been added to the Library. Now, I do not know whether the gentleman, in pursuing his Shakespearean studies, would prefer to get hold of that old and musty and dog-eared volume or to have a clean one in modern print. I think that, perhaps, would be valuable in a collection of curiosities in our National Museum, perhaps, if it did not cost too much. And why should the gentleman especially desire that volume of Thomas Jefferson's that has the thumb-marks of Thomas Jefferson on the margin? Does he take any pleasure in ascertaining the fact that Thomas Jefferson was not as cleanly in his habits as he ought to have been? [Laughter.] Does that improve the public mind? Does that give value to this great institution?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, there is no accusation of uncleanliness. The gentleman realizes that every book that we read thoroughly and handle a great deal is liable to become somewhat soiled.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood the gentleman to make a special reference in a commendatory way to the dirty thumb-marks on the margin of that page. [Laughter.] Now, I think that might be relegated to our museum of curiosities. How much did we have to pay for those thumb-marks? That is a practical question that comes up in this every-day world of ours; and we have no limit, no control, no espionage whatever over this gentleman who is in charge of these expenditures. He may value a thumb-mark of Thomas Jefferson at $5,000, for aught I know.

I am inclined to think, from the remarks of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], that probably he would put an extraordinary estimate upon it, and after what he has said, much as I respect him and much of confidence as I have in him on all matters pertaining to the river and harbor bill and to aquatic improvements of that kind, I would not trust him to buy volumes that may have the thumb-marks of Thomas Jefferson on them. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes under the rule.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two in reference to the management of the Library. I wish to say first that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] raised the question that the Superintendent of the Library Building, receiving $5,000 a year salary, had no right to receive any outside compensation. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that we fix the salaries, for instance, of the reporters of this House at $5,000 a year, and they are allowed, and they should be allowed, and they do, as a matter of fact, exercise their right during the months when Congress is not in session and when their work is not required here to earn other sums. I have the highest respect for these gentlemen, but I want to say that the services of a man competent to be the superintendent and architect of this great Library of Congress—and no one questions his competency—ought certainly also to be worth $5,000 a year. The gentleman from Wisconsin did not criticise the payments which we make to our own shorthand reporters, with opportunities for other employment during the Congressional recess, but when a man of extraordinary competency, upon whom great responsibilities are imposed, earns, in addition to his salary of $5,000 a year as superintendent of this building, other sums which are paid him for other work that he does, considers that is a matter of criticism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word in reference to the Library of Congress. It has been my fortune to see some of the great foreign libraries and, to some extent, to carry on, with others, studies in the great libraries of the world. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], I presume, will say that those studies were of small importance, and certainly no one values their importance less than myself; but still in that way I have had the opportunity of comparing the great libraries of Paris and London with the great Library of the United States, and I have risen here to-day to say that in the opportunities which our Library furnish to scholars, however little value my friend from Iowa may attach to their labors, in the promptness with which they can be attented to, in the facilities which are furnished to them for the careful investigation of any branch of history or science, there is no library in the world that, in my judgment, furnishes such facilities, such promptness, and such convenience as the Congressional Library of the United States.

[a] Excluding upper area of Dome and the crypt.
[b] See Report of Superintendent of Capitol, page 6.

Certainly my friend from Iowa will admit that is a thing of some value. My friend criticises the cost of something over $600,000. Let it be that. It not only furnishes a library, but it furnishes a building of beauty which is one of the assets of this nation, the enjoyment of the beauty of which is shared by the people from all parts of the country. Surely my friend from Iowa regards that as an asset of value. We spend, including the cost of the seeds and the cost of sending them out, one-half of all that is spent on the National Library to distribute worthless seeds to people who do not want them. Does my friend from Iowa think that that is a more judicious distribution of the public money than the expenditure of $600,000 for the public Library of the United States? I do not believe that he does. As is suggested, we spend more than $600,000—we spend between one and two million dollars—in printing worthless documents, which no man will take off our hands and which we can not send to our own constituents. Does my friend think that is the part of wisdom, rather than an expenditure of $600,000 on a library which is the most beautiful and in some respects the best in the world? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Iowa makes his criticism against an object not deserving of it and spares from his criticism a waste of public money far more reprehensible than any money spent on the Congressional Library of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON rose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia, a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman from Maine wishes to speak now, I will yield to him.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in a sense I agree with some of the suggestions of the gentleman from Iowa. It is a large sum of money for this purpose; whether it is too large or not I do not know. I do not understand that there is any specific suggestion made here that will reduce the expenses involved in the maintenance of the Library. Stated concretely and in gross, it does look to be a large sum. Whether it can be reduced or not I do not know. I have assumed that the committee, who has made a careful investigation of this and all other subjects, has found that no legitimate reduction could be made. I have not had time to investigate it. I would be glad to join the gentleman from Iowa in reducing any expenditure connected with the public Library of Congress that we could reasonably and legitimately make. I do not understand, as a matter of fact, that he intends to go any further than that. I do not understand that he makes any specific suggestion on this line. In the absence of a specific suggestion, so far as I am concerned, I feel that I must stand by the committee on their recommendation so far as these expenditures go.

Now, I think a word ought to be said in fairness in relation to the Librarian. I can understand how the gentleman from Iowa is justly disturbed on account of some things that may have occurred in connection with the Librarian. I am not qualified to express an opinion as to whether he is the best man for the place or not, but I can say that I fully indorse the suggestion of the gentleman from New York when he speaks of the efficiency of this Library as compared with others elsewhere. I have occasion to use both the Library of Congress and the Law Library, and to quite a large extent, and I undertake to say that it can not be questioned but that they are managed efficiently and successfully and that they exercise all care in enabling people to get a beneficial use of the Library.

I am not an expert on the matter as to what a librarian should be, but so far as my personal experience goes I want to say that the official force in the Library has treated every Member of this House with all consideration, and that we have ample opportunity for investigation so far as they have the books on hand. The force is able, competent, faithful, and efficient. This is no doubt due to the care and management of the Librarian. He should be given proper credit therefor.

Joking aside, I do not think any of us would contend that the Librarian was properly subject to criticism if he does put in the Library every book of a literary character that he can reasonably reach, rare and curious though it may be. Personally I should like to see in the Library—because I believe it to be one of the finest in the world—the finest literary collection in the world, and if it contained once in a while a curiosity I would not make any kick about that.

I would like to go there and if necessary be able to put my hand on any book, however rare and curious it might be. I would like to be able to go there in a legal investigation and get the benefit of the finest library in the world that ought to be maintained in connection with the court that has the largest jurisdiction in the world—the Supreme Court of the United States. Are the members of the committee aware of the fact that to-day down in this basement the reference law library has only about 30,000 volumes, and 70,000 or 80,000 volumes have to be carried away to the lumber rooms of the Library of Congress and can not be reached without delay and waiting for transmission? The Harvard Law School is arranging for a new library building, to be built this very next year, to contain—how many volumes do you think? And I wish you to compare it with the library that we have now which we can reach, with only about 30,000 or 40,000 volumes, as the case may be. Three hundred thousand volumes! So far as I am concerned I would like to see here in Washington where the profession can reach it and the courts can reach it as fine a library as they think necessary at the Harvard Law School in Cambridge, Mass. I do not wish to be understood as asserting that I am an expert on any part of this proposition, but I think every Member of the House, and I have no doubt my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] would stand behind every proposition that would put into this library every book that any person might need in conducting any investigation—and he would be willing to vote, and I understand him to be now, any reasonable and proper expense necessary to the judicious maintenance and operation of the library; and I would be glad to go with him in that direction. But in the absence, as I say, Mr. Chairman, of specific suggestions—and I imagine my friend like myself has not had the time to examine this with care so that he would feel justified in making specific criticisms of particular offices—in the absence of that I feel like following the recommendations of the committee upon this particular proposition.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, there is no motion to amend or to strike out. I think the Clerk ought to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Copyright office, under the direction of the Librarian of Congress: Register of copyrights, $3,000; chief clerk and chief of bookkeeping division, $2,000; chief of application division, $2,000; two clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks, at $1,600 each; eight clerks, at $1,400 each; ten clerks, at $1,200 each; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; thirteen clerks, at $900 each; two clerks, at $800 each; ten clerks, at $720 each; two clerks, at $600 each; two messenger boys, at $360 each. Arrears, special service: Three clerks, at $1,200 each; porter, $720; messenger boy, $360; in all, $75,300.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what the expense of the copyright division was, say, ten years ago?

Mr. LITTAUER. In 1898 the appropriations for the copyright office were $36,440. They were increased in 1901 to $51,080; in 1903 to $65,520; in 1905 and 1906 to the neighborhood of $75,000. The reason for this increase is that the new copyright law has drawn to the copyright office a very much greater number of applicants.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I was sorry to see the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] drop down from the high altitude that he was upon when discussing the uses of this Library to run his annual tilt against beans and peas and those other seeds that are so useful to the people of this country. [Laughter.] I did not suppose that he would find it necessary to bring in the seed question here, but I can see why gentlemen of his ilk, the scholars of the land, the men who are engaged in literary work, who are year after year making it necessary to have a large library building to hold the volumes that they thrust upon an unsuspecting public [laughter]—why that class of gentry should desire this Library to be maintained. I find that the gentleman regards it as a matter much to his credit, because it is inserted in his biography, which he himself, I suppose, kindly edited, that he is the author of a large number of publications. [Laughter.] Of course he is in favor of libraries. He wants some depository for them, and he wants the assistance of these trained men who know just where to put their hands on a volume to help him prepare these books. I take it that many an employee of this building helps literary gentlemen to original articles by knowing just where to put their hands on them in the shelves. [Laughter.] That class of men are especially in favor of the Library. I did not know that there was any selfishness in the defense made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], but I shall begin to suspect him [laughter], and I shall look soon for some publication copyrighted over here by his friends, and to which the shelves of the Library have made valuable contributions.

But what I wanted to say particularly was to protest again at a suggestion that was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] the third time—that I have hostility to this enterprise, to this institution. I want it to be maintained, but I do not want hundreds of thousands of dollars needlessly thrown away upon it. I do not want an army of unnecessary employees there. I do not want an entire regiment of the friends and protégés of this man Putnam to be foisted upon the public rolls, at salaries more or less extravagant. That is what I do not want.

And I want simply to direct the attention of the House to what I regard as a flagrant abuse, not that it can be remedied now, but that some one charged with the duty—the chairman of some committee having supervision of this matter—will take it up and strive in a businesslike way to bring it within the limitations of business methods.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on page 29, line——

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair that it is too late to raise the point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point submitted by the gentleman from New York is well taken. Debate having closed upon the paragraph, the point of order is too late.

Mr. HARDWICK. Were there any amendments offered to the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. There has been debate on this paragraph.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought the debate was about something on page 31. My attention was temporarily distracted.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate was on the paragraph in reference to the copyright office, and has now been finished.

Mr. HARDWICK. The reading has been finished?

The CHAIRMAN. The reading has been finished, and there was five minutes' debate, and the point of order now comes too late. The Clerk will read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, there are not many things we are allowed to enjoy in this great country of ours since the last forty years of Republican rule that are free. The principal thing that the Republican party has done for the country is to levy taxes on everything we enjoy, but we have got a free library, a library that every citizen of the United States may enjoy without taxation, a library that we may be proud of, and I am rather surprised to hear the indictment that the gentleman from Iowa has laid against his colleagues in this House who manage the business of the Republican party. I am heartily in favor of economy in the House, of our economizing in the Government where we can. I did not know before that there were hundreds of men and women employed in this library in the service of the Government whose services were not necessary, but I knew that we had a committee whose duty it is, in the examination of this particular bill, to investigate these questions and not appropriate money to carry on the Government rolls people whose services are not needed by the Government, and I am surprised that the gentlemen in charge of this great legislative bill should allow the indictment brought against them by the gentleman from Iowa to go unanswered, to the effect that they are now appropriating money for the carrying on of this library that involves the maintenance of numbers of men in the public service who are not needed.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I feel that in justice to the Librarian of Congress the statement made a moment ago by the gentleman from Iowa that he has persistently filled the Library with his friends and relatives should not go uncontradicted. As a matter of fact, the principal complaint made by some persons against the Librarian has been that he invariably insists that every appointment made in the Library shall be based exclusively upon efficiency, requiring always that the person appointed shall have ability to discharge the duty for which he or she is appointed. The truth is, since Mr. Putnam has been in charge of this Library, he has not made appointments, as has been charged, but on the contrary there has been a more earnest effort made than ever has been made in the past to make a fair selection of appointees for the Library service from the various sections of our country, keeping in mind always the fitness of the person for the place to be filled. Now, as far as the accusation of extravagance in the conduct of this great Library is concerned, it can be answered in a word, and when made it can not be successfully contradicted. That answer is, that the scale of wages or the scale of salaries fixed in this bill, which obtains for all lines of clerks and employees in the Library of Congress, is lower than the scale of wages or salaries paid in any other Department of this Government for like services or employment. No man upon this floor can gainsay that statement. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Distribution of card indexes: For service in connection with the distribution of card indexes and other publications of the Library, including not exceeding $500 for freight charges, expressage, and traveling expenses connected with such distribution, $10,800.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is an increase over the amount carried for the appropriations last year, which were $7,500.

Mr. LITTAUER. I understand the point of order is reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to reserve his point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably the $10,800 submitted to the committee here is an increase over the amount for this purpose last year. We believe that there is no item in the bill more worthy of an increase than the one we have now reached. This distribution of card indexes is made to about 700 librarians throughout the United States—in the South, the North, the East, and the West. It is a service that is continually being asked for more and more. It is one of the aids the Library of Congress gives to every other library in the United States, or at least the 700 that avail themselves of the privilege. The importance of this service is growing very rapidly, and in order to meet the increased demand this extra $3,000 for this force is required. The net income from the sale last year was $15,500, or more than twofold the salaries paid to this force. The force required is a growing one, and ought to grow year by year, consequently can not be specifically appropriated for. The salaries extend from $360 up to $2,000; the majority of those employed on this work are paid under $660 a year. It seems to me that the attention the Committee on Appropriations has given this and sundry other similar matters should be taken into account before indiscriminate points of order are made against items of this kind. These items received a thorough investigation, and the committee is ready at all times to give a proper explanation to this House for its submissions if the hearings do not contain the information that is necessary.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How long has an item like this been carried in the appropriation bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. Since 1904.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the increase in the appropriation here is made necessary simply by reason of the increase in that branch of the service?

Mr. LITTAUER. The demand is increasing largely.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, being a work in progress.

Mr. LITTAUER. The amount in the last appropriation bill was $7,800; the one before that, $6,800, and in the one before that, $4,900. It is a work in progress.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think that would be subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia make the point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please state his point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. The point of order is that it is an increase in the amount authorized by law to be appropriated for this purpose. It is new legislation. It is for the payment of extra officers that are not provided for by any existing law. I just want to say this, if the Chair will permit me. I understand the gentleman has suggested in his statement that they had to have this money to go on with this work, increasing the force and spreading out this work. Now, the bare fact that the thing has been done from one year to another does not make it a work—that is, a continuous work—that would justify the gentleman from Indiana in the conclusions he reaches. As far as I can judge from reading it, so far as it can be ascertained from any statement of the gentleman from New York, it does not seem to be that way. It seems to be a new, additional, force. I want to say this in answer to the gentleman's statement, that I do not know anything as to whether it is meritorious or not, but I object to the system, and I am willing to reply to him every time he makes that contention. I am not trying to do anything except to insist upon having the rules of this House carried out in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the Library of Congress is authorized by law. This is a part of the Library work. It is one of the things which is generally authorized in the maintenance of the Library. It is not one of those cases where a point of order is good against the item. It is a service done in continuation of the work of the Library, and merely because the amount is increased it does not come within the rule so as to make it subject to a point of order, as it would if it were an increase of salary. It is for a continuation of a work in progress, the work of maintaining the Library, which is existing under the law, and which work is done in pursuance of law. It seems to me under these circumstances it is proper to appropriate the amount determined upon by the committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, this distribution of cards is not a new matter in the appropriation bill, but the increase in the number of cards and the increase in the distribution of cards to State libraries and to private libraries is growing every year. As long as that policy is pursued this appropriation must increase year by year. If you cut down the appropriation, there is about $600 of this amount of increase that is necessary for paying express charges on these cards, which are sent to Texas, to Nevada, and all over the country. If you cut down the appropriation, then the distribution of these index cards, so much desired and sought for by State libraries, will have to cease. Whether it is the business of the librarian to do that work for that purpose, and to send those index cards abroad, is another proposition. I think I have made the statement so that you can understand what this increased appropriation is for.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, just a word upon the point of order. I think the gentleman from Georgia, who has just spoken, has struck the nub of the whole thing. If the law which created the Congressional Library authorized the Librarian or those connected with the Library to furnish at public expense card indexes to the libraries throughout the country, this provision is, then, a continuing law; but I question the right. They have just as much right to send anything else they may see fit, and I insist that the point of order is good, because these people in doing this work are outside of their legal purview. Being outside of it, anything they do thereunder is contrary to law, any appropriation made thereunder is in violation of law, and the whole provision is subject to a point of order.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Does my friend know that these card indexes are not furnished at public expense, but that they are paid for by the people who get them, and that the money received from this source is turned into the Treasury, and that this item does not amount to one-third of the money that is returned from this source and turned into the Treasury?

Mr. PRINCE. I will grant that.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. And that this Library by this paragraph in the bill is enabled to serve all the libraries throughout the United States?

Mr. PRINCE. I will ask the gentleman, who is on the Library Committee and the chairman of the joint committee, if he will please state to the House whether there is any authority of law conferred upon the Library to do this work?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Why, just as the gentleman from New York indicated, it is part of the ordinary work of the Library.

Mr. PRINCE. Is it a part of the duties of the Librarian?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I think it is a part of the legitimate functions of the Library.

Mr. PRINCE. And you regard the distribution of the cards as a part of the business of collecting the books of the country and maintaining and taking care of them? I think it is clearly contrary to law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the Congressional Library is a national institution. Its purpose is to serve the entire country, and if it could reasonably have been contemplated at the time it was authorized and its several functions were established by law that distributing index cards would be a part of its duty in serving the country, perhaps it would have been specifically mentioned; but I think it is clear that as a national institution it must have been contemplated that it would perform all of the reasonable things that go with an institution of that character. It is said that these card indexes are made partly for use in the establishment itself and the surplus is distributed for the benefit of the people, through the respective libraries of the country. It seems to me that that is one of the minor details, one of the minor functions of the institution that the law did not provide for, that no law could have made adequate provision for in detail. The Library is authorized to do these general things that are implied from the very nature of the institution itself, and among those things it seems to me nothing can be clearer that its implied right to perform the ordinary functions of a national library, that it has a right to publish and distribute surplus copies of the card indexes, in order that the people of the country may receive additional benefits from an institution which they established and for which they pay.

I do not believe it is necessary under the rules adopted by this House for every particular minor item of detail to be enacted into specific law; that these matters of detail that are essential and a part of the general functions of an institution are presumed to go along with it, and appropriations may be made under the rules to carry them out. If that is the case, if there is an increase of expenditure, or if the enlargement of some particular branch makes an increase of expenditure necessary, it is not subject to a point of order at all. I believe the point of order against this proposition is not well taken.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, one further suggestion. If it be true that they have a right to get a force to distribute card indexes, would it not follow that they have a right to get a force to distribute the books themselves throughout the country on the ground that the people want the books out of the National Library, and therefore they will send them out? The moment you begin to distribute a portion of it, will gentlemen be kind enough to tell me where it will stop? I maintain that this is outside of the function of the Library. There seems to be a very lax management over at that building. Here is an opportunity to close at least this door for an improvement. You permit them to distribute card indexes, and the next time they will say, "We are distributing books and sending them to New York; sending them to Atlanta, Ga., and to Galesburg, Ill.," and claim that this distribution of the books to the people throughout the country is a part of the business of the Library.

The CHAIRMAN. It is hardly within the province of the Chair to enter into a minute consideration and discussion of the various duties imposed upon the Librarian by the general act of Congress creating his office and in more or less general terms defining his duties. It seems to have been conceded by both branches of Congress and the President in past years that this was a proper part of the duties, because appropriations have from time to time been made for it. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that the amount of appropriation is increased this year without previous authority of law, and that point would be good were it not for the exception found in the last part of the second clause of Rule XXI in favor of public works and objects already in progress. The Chair finds that it was ruled in the Fifty-seventh Congress, as appears on page 349 of the Manual, that "an appropriation to complete a list of claims was held to be the completion of a public work or object." The Chair thinks that this is even more within the exception than the completion of a list of claims, and therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Temporary services: For special, temporary, and miscellaneous service, at the discretion of the Librarian, to continue available until expended, $2,000.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what this is used for.

Mr. LITTAUER. Largely for stenographic work in connection with various bureaus. It is a miscellaneous fund at the service of the Librarian, of $2,000, and he applies it wherever it may be needed.

Mr. HAY. The only thing in the hearings is this:

Mr. LITTAUER. The next item is a temporary service, $2,000. Do you use all the appropriation?

Yes, sometimes in the summer time we are able to save several hundred dollars, but we use it all before the year is over.

I do not think there is any explanation of what that is used for. It does seem to me with all the appropriations for the Library for the different kinds of service, that there ought to be some explanation of the use of this money.

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe in the early part of the hearing the Librarian did state that he was compelled to draw on this appropriation for temporary services to aid in the work, both in his own office and in one or two of the subdivisions for stenographic work. Two thousand dollars has been appropriated year after year, and is always used to good advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous and contingent expenses of the Library, stationery, supplies, and all stock and materials directly purchased, miscellaneous traveling expenses, postage, transportation, and all incidental expenses connected with the administration of the Library and the Copyright Office, which sum shall be so apportioned as to prevent a deficiency therein, $7,500.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The day before yesterday I came forward in a modest way as a reformer. I undertook to point out a few cases in which several thousand dollars now uselessly expended could be saved to the Treasury. I did not receive much encouragement and I received still less help. I have no pride of opinion about these matters. I am not responsible for the legislation. I call the attention of the members of the committee to the facts and they can assume the responsibility. Before we read the next paragraph I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the expense of maintaining the Library since 1898 has increased from $30,000 to $77,505.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will not the gentleman call attention to the fact that in two years thereafter—that in 1899 the expense was $69,265?

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not know it. The gentleman from New York can call attention to that fact.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the gentleman stated that for 1898 the expense was but $30,000. It seems to me that the gentleman is misinformed. The figures before me show that in 1898, $51,440 was expended for its care.

Mr. JOHNSON. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I will state that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations stated in these hearings that the expense in 1898 was $30,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. He must have been mistaken.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is where I got the information. The Library is no larger now than it was in 1898. The grounds are no larger than they were in 1898. This expenditure has nothing to do with the books in the Library, the clerical force in the reading room, or the force among the shelves.

Mr. LITTAUER. Not one-half of the space that is now occupied in the Library was occupied in 1898. The expense then was $51,440 for maintenance and care. The $30,000 statement was an evident mistake. The expense now is $77,505. The collections have since been arranged and distributed, and the building is visited by at least twice as many people now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope I will make myself clear to the gentleman. I have the figures here, but let me answer the gentleman from New York. I am not talking about the books in the Library.

Mr. LITTAUER. I understand that you refer to the care and custody of the establishment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not talking about the people who handle those books. I am talking about the care and maintenance of the building and grounds. The building is no larger and the grounds are no larger. It requires no more watchmen, and it ought to require no more expense to take care of that building now than it did ten years ago. Beginning with 1898, the expense of the maintenance of the Library building and grounds has increased from $51,440 in 1898 to $79,445. I notice that the second item in the next paragraph provides for the clerical force in charge of the superintendent. There are clerks whose aggregate salary is $6,000. When questioned before the committee as to what these clerks were doing the testimony was that they disbursed $500,000 a year. There are some 300 employees of all kinds. The salaries of these employees are paid through this office. I have in mind as I am talking now a manufacturing plant that cost a million of dollars, which employs 1,500 to 2,000 people. Their wages are paid twice a month. The books of that great corporation, whose output amounts to millions of dollars a year, and all the pay rolls of these 1,500 or 2,000 employees are made up by three bright young men, whose aggregate salaries do not reach $5,000 a year. Yet over here at the Library of Congress, with only about 300 people on the rolls, whose salaries run in even sums, $100 or $200 or $250 a month, we expend $6,000 in clerical hire to make up those rolls and to pay those 300 people. Gentlemen, I believe that one bright young man worth $1,500 a year can keep those books and disburse that money. Still, we have four clerks, and I don't know how many janitors and messengers, and all that sort of thing. I simply call attention to it. If you want to correct it, you can do it.

The other day the remark was made all around me and on the other side, "Oh, you must not attack these little fellows." If you are afraid to attack the picket line you will surely be afraid to take the breastworks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. If we propose to correct the small abuse, you cry out that it is such a little thing that you ought to let the poor folks alone, and then when you undertake to correct the great abuse you come in contact with great political influence and power. I believe that this House ought to take these bills and all these offices and correct the evils as they come to them, whether they are large or whether they are small, and as you get one out of the way it will be that much easier to dispose of the next one.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York one question. I notice in line 18, page 29, there is a provision for "special temporary and miscellaneous services, $2,000."

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman from Virginia has already called attention to that item.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And on line 18, page 30, is for "miscellaneous expenses." What is the difference between miscellaneous services and miscellaneous expenses?

Mr. LITTAUER. One is for clerical service and the other can not under the statute be used for clerical service. One is for general expenses—purchases of small items, like stationery supplies, stock—and the other is for clerical service. As I stated before, under the law miscellaneous contingent expense appropriations can not be disbursed for personal services.

The Clerk read as follows:

Custody, care, and maintenance of Library building and grounds: For superintendent of the Library building and grounds, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,000; clerk, $1,600; clerk, $1,400; clerk, $1,000; one messenger; one assistant messenger; two telephone operators, at $600 each; captain of watch $1,400; lieutenant of watch, $1,000; eighteen watchmen; carpenter, $900; painter, $900; foreman of laborers, $900; fourteen laborers, at $480 each; two attendants in ladies' room, at $480 each; two check boys, at $360 each; mistress of charwomen, $425; assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; forty-five charwomen; chief engineer, $1,500; one assistant engineer, $1,200; three assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; electrician, $1,500; assistant electrician, $1,000; machinist, $1,000; machinist, $900; two wiremen, at $900 each; plumber, $900; three elevator conductors, at $720 each; nine firemen; six skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $77,505.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman in charge of the bill, and in view of the criticisms that have been made within the last few minutes as to the size of this force, what investigation the committee made in reference to the necessity of the various employees for which an appropriation is recommended.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have from time to time, year after year, looked into the matter of this force. Instead of six clerks employed in the care and disbursement of funds under the charge of the custodian I find but four appropriated for here, plus one messenger and one assistant messenger. There are 432 employees. There are, I think, about a dozen different heads of appropriations, each one of which has to be taken care of. We all know how much more complicated Government bookkeeping is than the ordinary commercial bookkeeping. I do not believe the number of clerks is excessive. Leaving the clerks and coming down to the other force, such as telephone operators, required in the conduct of the work there, we come to the watch force of eighteen men. These watchmen do practically the same work as our policemen about the Capitol and they receive $720.

Mr. HAY. You have no specific appropriation for the wages of the watchmen.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a general provision for watchmen.

Mr. HAY. Who fixes that?

Mr. LITTAUER. If you turn to page 161 of the bill, section 2, you will find the pay for telephone switchboard operators, assistant messengers, firemen, and watchmen is at the rate of $720 per annum.

Mr. HAY. That is a new provision, is it?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; it has always run along in that way.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has the floor.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a question if he desires it.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe the force connected with the work of care and maintenance of the Library is excessive or their salaries are excessive.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then, as I understand it, it is the judgment of the gentleman in charge of this bill, after his personal investigation as a basis for these appropriations, that we can not reasonably dispense with any of those men who are mentioned in this paragraph of the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. I could not indicate to you where any one of them could be reduced. I do not believe the force at all has any supernumerary in it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In other words, every man appropriated for here is necessary for the proper discharge of the duties under these circumstances and the proper care of the building?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes. I will say the increase in force has only been an occasional charwoman or an elevator conductor.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And notwithstanding the size of the gross appropriation the committee is satisfied that the details are absolutely necessary?

Mr. LITTAUER. I surely am.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the six clerks I would like to have a word to say, because I do not think the record is exactly complete upon the subject. When the item was first reached in the consideration of this bill in subcommittee it struck me the force was too large, and I interrogated the superintendent in charge of the buliding, who has control of these clerks, upon the subject, and here is what he says: I read from the hearings. The superintendent said:

> Now, there are 240 people in the Library proper; charwomen, 45, and 15 laborers; and all told in our force there are about 110 or 115 individuals of all sorts. The pay rolls have to be made up carefully, and payments are made twice a month. There is no end of vouchers for detail expenditures of all kinds, purchases of books and expenditures made by the Librarian himself, as well as our own expenditures. That keeps the force pretty busy.

That satisfied me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: That in addition to these disbursements this force makes the disbursements for the Botanic Garden, and also all matters that come under the control of the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. BURLESON. That is a fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And at times there are certain monuments and other matters for which disbursements are made, which come under the control of this force.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know who has the floor, but I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not be recognized to amend his own amendment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent for permission to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a question. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to corroborate the suggestion of the gentleman in immediate charge of the bill as to the necessity of all these employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I did not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, if the gentleman does not do that can he state what employees we can dispense with?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not say that we can dispense with any employees.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can we; and if so, which of them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I am unable to state. Unfortunately I have not had the same opportunity to investigate this as the gentleman in charge of the bill has had. As long as they were making up the record as to just what services were to be performed by these clerks, I thought something should be stated that evidently had been overlooked, and that was that these clerks also have charge of the disbursements for the Botanic Gardens and of matters coming under the control of the Joint Committee on the Library. Now, I am in the same position as the gentleman from Maine. I am compelled to rely very largely upon the investigations that have been made by members of the subcommittee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I got the impression that the gentleman from New York had particularly investigated this matter, and that is why I made the inquiry. I understand now the contrary to be the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have assumed that these gentlemen who investigated the matter did not find that this service was such that it demanded a radical change; and, although, perhaps, they might not have been convinced, that if they had an opportunity and free hand to do so they would have effected some improvement.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I would like to know how much is the appropriation for the Botanic Garden and this extraordinary labor put upon these various clerks?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I am not a walking encyclopedia of appropriations, and I can not answer that.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is $20,000.

Mr. BURLESON. It is something about half a million disbursed there by the Library.

Mr. JOHNSON. These clerks disburse, in round numbers, half a million dollars a year that we appropriate for the Congressional Library. They also disburse $20,000 which we appropriate for the Botanic Garden; so that they disburse, in round numbers, five to six hundred thousand dollars a year, and they keep books and pay about 300 employees their salaries for their services.

Mr. LITTAUER. Four hundred and thirty-two.

Mr. JOHNSON. And it takes four high-priced men to do it. I repeat what I said before. I believe one bright young man worth $1,500 a year could keep these books and disburse that money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the amount disbursed is not a fair criterion of the labor needed. For instance, the gentleman will find farther on in this bill that there is a cashier at the assay office in the city of New York who handles $51,000,000 a year. He has been receiving $2,000.

Now, it may be much easier to handle that much money than to pay the employees connected with these other two establishments. If the gentleman knows of one man who can efficiently perform this work, why, he has a remedy now. I suggest that in the performance of his duty he should move to strike out those clerks which he considers unnecessary and put in the bill a provision for a clerk at a salary that he thinks proper for the duties required there. Then the committee will have an opportunity to pass upon something definite, and he will not be indulging in criticisms that he is unprepared to back up with definite suggestions as to the manner in which reforms can be effected.

He may be correct. He may know some bright young man who could do this work. It may be true that he could, but I am assured by those gentlemen who investigated this matter that they do not believe it could be done; and in my opinion they are better qualified, with the information they have, to pass upon this matter than the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will give the gentleman the information he wants. The trouble in the minds of some of the Members is to account for the increased expenses in caring for this building. It began in 1898 with $51,440. It has run up in nine years to $77,500. That is $26,000 increase in nine years. That increase can be accounted for by the increased work done by the Library.

Let me give just one illustration. The gentleman from Georgia a moment ago made a point of order against an increase of expenditure here, from $7,000 to $10,000, for distributing cards. Those cards are packed by these people whom the gentleman from South Carolina talks about. There is something in there besides bookkeeping. There is something in there besides disbursing money. They pack all those cards, they send them to the depot, they send men with them to the libraries, they bring back and unpack and repack, day after day, to every library throughout the country. There are a lot of increased expenses that were not incurred a few years ago, and there are a lot of things just like it being done now that were not done in 1898, when we began this expenditure at $51,440. No one, unless he sits at the table where we sit, can be blamed for not knowing these things. It would take months to sit here and pass this bill if we had to do what the gentleman from South Carolina wants to do now, give a detailed statement and explain to this House every dollar of increase in expenditures all along the line carried in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina if you have any confidence in your Committee on Appropriations you must take some of these things for granted as correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not mind the interruption. I only want to satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have the utmost confidence in every member of the Committee on Appropriations, and the other day I took occasion to express my very great appreciation of the zeal that they have shown in trying to find out where this money was going to. I am complaining about the whole system. The committee have done the best they could, but the trouble is that they bring before them the heads of the bureaus and the heads of the Departments, and they come with only one song and that is, "Give us more men and give us more pay." Now, that is all the evidence that the Committee on Appropriations have to go by. I think they go to the wrong sources to get their information. Some of these bureau chiefs who come before them do not know anything about it themselves.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, with all respect for the gentleman from South Carolina and for his information and the sources of his information, I want to say that he has made an unjust criticism of the Committee on Appropriations. We do not make up this bill at haphazard, as he seems to think. It is true that some of the heads of Departments, as I stated on the floor in my opening speech, are not in touch with the business in detail. They do not know the details, and once in awhile in the hearings we run across a man of that kind; and you seem to read that man's testimony and not all the testimony.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have read all the testimony you took, and you did not take enough.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We did not leave out any.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Just one question. I notice that the total expenditure for the custody, care, and maintenance of the Library building and grounds is $77,505.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Now, this property cost over $7,000,000. The result of a little computation will show that that is less than 1 per cent per annum.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. The gentleman ought to be able to admit offhand that that is not an unreasonable expense for maintenance.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from Iowa says that here is a new building with no repairs to be made, and he says that it should be kept up for much less money than we pay for it. Now, in the keeping and the maintaining of the building, as you will discover in this bill, there is much else done than simply sweeping and scouring. The opinion held by some Members is that keeping and maintaining a building is simply keeping it clean and lighted and beautiful.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I am sustaining the gentleman's contention.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. It only costs 1 per cent to maintain it in its present magnificent condition.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes. I want to say that when we get up this bill next winter you will probably find an increase right at this point. Why? Because the appropriation authorizes the superintendent of the building to expend more and more each year, and if we are going to keep that up, you will find an increase of expenditure all along the line. We can not avoid it.

Mr. GOULDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Did the committee in its investigation in regard to the Library look into the official conduct of the captain of the watch?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have information that that gentleman is not efficient and has not been doing his work in the manner that he ought to do it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Who is the gentleman speaking of?

Mr. GOULDEN. The captain of the watch.

Mr. LITTAUER. On the contrary, he is one of the most efficient men we have. The result of his work is certainly beyond criticism. Any gentleman can see that by observing how well the building is preserved from any chipping or marring or anything of that sort, and how perfectly order is maintained throughout the building.

Mr. GOULDEN. When the committee undertakes to investigate this question again, I would like to be called before it with some information that may lead the committee to think differently.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not want to conceal the fact that as long as men perform these functions that are human, you will find that a captain of the watch or it may be a clerk, or it may be the chief clerk or somebody else in some Department does not do his duty. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. GOULDEN. I asked the gentleman for information whether the committee had investigated in regard to it.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have investigated. I want to say to you that it is our policy not to drag into this House on the floor everything that we hear. I could tell the gentleman a story that would illustrate that wonderfully well if it was possible on this floor. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOTANIC GARDEN.

For superintendent, $1,800.

For assistants and laborers, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $14,593.75.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the provision in line 18, page 32, that the amount appropriated for assistants and laborers under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $14,593, is an increase of $2,000 over the amount carried by previous bills and over the amount authorized by law.

Mr. LITTAUER. What law do I understand the gentleman is invoking by this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to make the point that the appropriation of $14,593.75 is a certain amount of increase over the amount authorized by law.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is a work authorized by law; it is a continuance of the work; it is the Botanic Garden.

The appropriation is for a continuing work, and it seems to me that it stands on all fours with the ruling of the Chair a moment ago.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from New York has said, it is not only a continuous work, but it was developed before the committee that the grounds had become barren and would not sustain the shrubbery and flowers as authorized by law to be planted and maintained there. Part of this money, or the most of it, is for fertilizer.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think the gentleman is on the wrong item.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is not there a statute that authorizes the employment of additional laborers and assistants in the service in Washington?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; but that is in the classified clerical service. This appropriation here is for the assistants and laborers. It was a continuance of the work authorized by law. The increase of appropriation appears to me to be as regular as any appropriation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would be analogous to the purchase of additional shrubbery or bulbs or something of that kind in connection with the service.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is what this is for.

Mr. BURLESON. The cost of labor has increased, but we are not increasing the number of laborers at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair desires to hear me, I would like to say just a word. This particular appropriation against which I made the point of order is undoubtedly subject to it. It is for the pay of assistants and laborers. It is increasing the pay of people employed, over the amount carried by law last year, and if I understand the rules at all or any of the rulings made by the occupant of the chair, I do not see how there can be any distinction. Every laborer continues to work as long as the Government keeps him and pays him, of course.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I can not appreciate why this increase should be more subject to a point of order on the gentleman's reasoning than any part of the appropriation would be.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I have made it only on this increase.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I tried to hear the argument made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], and he said that this was a continuing work, just the same as purchasing trees, shrubs, and plants. The gentleman should read what follows on lines 20 to 25. There is a provision for the purchasing of trees, shrubs, and plants.

Mr. LITTAUER. One is the same as the other.

Mr. PRINCE. Oh, no; one can not be the same as the other. One is for assistants and laborers. Now, if the number of assistants and laborers has not been increased, then the salaries of those have been increased, because there has been an increase in the present bill. It was formerly $12,593.75. If there were then ten laborers drawing $12,500 and odd, there are twelve laborers now proposed drawing $14,500. Clearly there is an increase in the salaries of the assistants and laborers. If they have added to the number of assistants and laborers, namely, twelve, and they purpose having fourteen now under the law or twenty under the law, then they have added to the number of laborers. Take either horn of the dilemma that you wish and you will fall within Rule XXI, which forbids you on an appropriation bill to increase the salary of laborers or to add to their number except by law or by resolution. The burden is upon the proponents of this bill to show that they are within the rules of the House. The burden is not upon us who oppose the proposition to show that we are outside of the rules. They have brought a bill in here supposed to be within the rules of the House, and when we question their right to a proposition under the rules they should show the law by which they make this proposition, else it goes out.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, all I care to take exception to is the last part of the statement. In my judgment the gentleman making the point of order against the provisions of a bill has the duty to perform to inform the committee why he makes that point of order. Those in charge of the bill can not be called upon to infer what reasons may be in the mind of the gentleman making the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] that if you look to the estimates you will discover that there is no addition to the salaries of the laborers and assistants.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I desire to ask the gentleman how the increase comes?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It comes in the number of laborers and assistants.

Mr. PRINCE. Then you increase the number?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. From all the information before us it is an increase in the force and not in the salary, and that is all there is in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist upon his point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an item of appropriation for assistants and laborers under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress. The Chair is unable to see that this stands in a different position from the appropriation for laborers in and about any of the other Departments or buildings, and thinks that it hardly comes within the exception as to public works in progress mentioned in the second clause of Rule XXI. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I now move an amendment. We do not wish to cripple the service in any sense. I move to amend by inserting the original amount, $12,593.75.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the committee will not insert the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell me why he is opposed to it?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am opposed to it because in our own way we hope to restore it.

Mr. HARDWICK. How?

Mr. LITTAUER. I trust in the end that we may have a rule here to enable the committee—a majority of it—to vote to determine what salaries are to be paid and what forces to be employed.

Mr. PRINCE. Then the gentleman's purpose is to transfer the consideration of the appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government from the Committee of the Whole House to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. LITTAUER. I stated my purpose, and that is all I care to state. I trust the committee will support me in my position.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PRINCE) there were—ayes 36, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For procuring manure, soil, tools, fuel, purchasing trees, shrubs, plants, and seeds; and for services, materials, and miscellaneous supplies, and contingent expenses in connection with repairs and improvements to Botanic Gardens, under direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $6,500.

Mr. HARDWICK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make the point of order against this paragraph, or I will reserve it if any gentleman wishes to discuss it. I do not think this is a continuing work. The question has already been argued in advance by two gentlemen who are opposed to my position in this matter, the gentleman in charge of the bill and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. I do not care to submit any argument, but they did not convince me that this was a continuing work in the sense of the uniform rulings of all the occupants of the chair upon this question, and I therefore make the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I covered this a moment ago, but I want to repeat that procuring manure, soil, tools, fuel, and purchasing trees is an annual expense ever since the garden was established and an increasing annual expense ever since it has been established. If that is not continuing work, then I am sadly mistaken.

Mr. BURLESON. I will direct the Chair also to the fact that last year there were $5,000 appropriated and $1,000 in the deficiency bill also.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph against which this point of order is urged shows upon its face that it is for the purpose of improving and continuing a Government plant. It is in continuation of appropriations heretofore made for a public work and object in progress, and therefore within the exception to the general prohibition found in the second clause of Rule XXI. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE.

For compensation of the President of the United States, $50,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if he can tell me in what part of this bill provision is made for the employee at the White House commonly known as the social secretary to the wife of the President of the United States?

Mr. LITTAUER. We have never taken up the exact employment of persons connected with the executive force employed at the White House. They are provided for on the recommendation of the President of the United States through his secretary. I have no doubt every one of that executive force is included in the next three paragraphs that will be read.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am asking the gentleman in all sincerity; I observe the hearings of the committee do not disclose the fact—that from the Executive Office appearing before the committee.

Mr. LITTAUER. It has been customary for committees on appropriations to take the wish of the President of the United States as their reason for the insertion of items in connection with the executive force of his own office.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman know in point of fact whether or not any of the employees who are supposed to be assigned to the President's office, and who are included in this appropriation, perform the service of the official commonly known as "social secretary?"

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know anything about it, but I should say, if I were President of the United States, I would want some one to take care of that duty.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am talking about the fact, not whether you would or would not; I am inquiring whether there is such an appropriation in this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Everyone who performs duty in connection with the executive work of the President, as far as the clerical force goes, is included in this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is there provision for that sort of thing in this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. What sort of thing?

Mr. HARDWICK. For the employment of a "social secretary" under the guise of a clerk.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know where the gentleman gets the designation of "social secretary;" it is not known to the law.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know it is not known to the law, but it is known as a fact. There is one clerk of class 4, four clerks of class 3. What about the one clerk of class 2? Do you know what duties are performed by that clerk?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not; I have made no inquiry into the service connected with this force.

Mr. HARDWICK. And know nothing about it at all?

Mr. LITTAUER. Except they are recommended by the President through his secretary.

Mr. HARDWICK. Through his secretary? Did the secretary appear before the committee?

Mr. LITTAUER. He did not; but we have the recommendation in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. HARDWICK. Nobody comes, but the secretary of the President sends down a little note telling what he wants?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will answer the gentleman's question candidly. There was not a scintilla of evidence to show that Mrs. Roosevelt has a social clerk at $1,400. I never heard of it until the committee had made up the bill, and I do not believe that there is a member of the Committee on Appropriations that had ever heard of it. Now, so far as we were concerned, we knew nothing about it then, and know nothing about it now. Whether it is true or not I do not know.

Mr. HARDWICK. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to the following in the office of the President of the United States: Secretary, $5,000; two assistant secretaries, at $3,000 each; executive clerk, $2,500; executive clerk and disbursing officer, $2,000; seven clerks, at $2,000 each; one clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 4, who shall be a telegrapher; four clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 2; steward, $1,800; chief doorkeeper, $1,800; eight doorkeepers, at $1,200 each; four messengers, at $1,200 each; five messengers, at $900 each; watchman, $900; one fireman; laborer, $720; laborer, $600; in all, $66,340.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer this amendment, and I desire to have it reported and then I will speak to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "dollars," at the end of line 21, page 33, the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the salary of any clerk who shall perform the duties of the position or office commonly known as the 'social secretary' of the wife of the President of the United States or any service of that nature."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the New York papers have carried an article like this about this matter:

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1906.

Miss Isabelle L. Hagner, social secretary to the wife of the President, is a beneficiary of and the President the sponsor for an example of diversion of funds appropriated by Congress that is causing widespread resentment here. Miss Hagner is carried on the rolls at the White House under a contingent fund as a clerk at $1,400 a year, while the appropriation contemplated no such use of the money.

Mrs. Fairbanks, wife of the Vice-President; Mrs. Bonaparte, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and others pay their social secretaries out of their personal funds, but the wife of the President does not do so. There has been strong objection to the action of some of the Cabinet officials in diverting money from the uses for which it was appropriated, and now the abuse is found to exist in the White House itself. It is believed that some searching and pertinent questions will be asked on the floor when the appropriation bill comes up next week.

[Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. That refers to the gentleman, I suppose.

Mr. HARDWICK. I resent the imputation. I didn't know anything about it.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that the gentleman resents the imputation that he could ask searching questions.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not like the gentleman's manner about this thing.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman does not want my manner, I will change it. There are a good many people who do not like the gentleman's manner about this bill, and I think if he would change it, it would meet the approval of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have no doubt that some people who want this bill to go through just as it is would approve it. Their opinion is immaterial to me. I have offered this amendment because I do not think there is any law or any public sentiment that will authorize the wife of the President of the United States, not the President himself, to have a "social secretary" without paying for it out of her own pocket, and like all the Cabinet ladies. This has never been done before.

Mr. LITTAUER. Never been done?

Mr. HARDWICK. If it has ever been done I will withdraw this amendment. I understand it has never been done under any Administration before. If the gentleman can state it as a fact that any President of the United States has ever, no matter what political party he belonged to, had it done, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am not advised as to the fact as to whether or not in the past there was a social secretary for the wife of the President of the United States provided for, but I have heard it stated that Mrs. Cleveland had from this very appropriation like service, and that it has been the custom at the White House for many years past to provide such clerical assistance out of this appropriation, and no one before has ever questioned the right to do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman would state that as a fact I would not insist upon this amendment. I have inquired diligently, with a view of finding out what the facts were, but have never found anybody who claimed that there had been such an officer before this Administration.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think I have stated what is substantially the fact, as substantially as any of the statements made by the gentleman here.

Mr. HARDWICK. On what basis?

Mr. LITTAUER. On rumor. What is your statement of fact based on?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have asked two or three of the Members here—the old Members. The gentleman seems to be inclined to be facetious about this thing, but I am in earnest.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am in earnest, and trust the committee is also.

Mr. HARDWICK. If this be true, it is not right.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman what paper he read that from?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not only withdraw his proposition, but will take back all he has said on the subject. He is a Member of the Congress of the United States. He is speaking in the hearing of the whole world. The American people are maintaining a very moderate and modest establishment known as the "White House." They are maintaining the President and certain secretaries and clerks for the convenient and orderly management of the business of that representative institution. It is the most modest in the expenditure of any country's executive office known as a respectable country in the world; modest in all respects, carefully administered; and this is the first time, I believe I may say, in the whole history of the country that anybody has undertaken to criticise the expenditures of this clerical force at the White House and to place a limit upon the uses that the small force there may be put to.

I do not know a thing in the world about it so far as the necessity for clerical aid for the wife of the President is concerned. I know that there devolves upon the wife of the President a large volume of social duties, duties that she owes to the American people, duties that she owes to the women of America, official social duties, just as much incumbent upon her as the duties of the President are incumbent upon him. Is the American Congress willing to say: "Out of this pittance of appropriation we will guard against the possibility of that lady having a clerk to assist her in the performance of these social obligations?" The wife of the gentleman from Georgia, if he has a wife, and all our wives would feel offended if there should be neglect of those duties; and now that the gentleman is entering, as I hope, upon a political career, I beg him that he will not allow himself to be marked and pointed to in future as the man who undertook to say that the wife of the President should not have the use of a clerk in the White House. To me it is almost the most shocking thing that I have ever heard on the floor of this House, and the gentleman says he is in earnest about it. Does he reflect that the American people do not inquire into the details of the family relation of the President of the United States to public affairs? Does he reflect that we look upon the wife of the President as a part of the Government of the United States, as it were, and that we are careful in America not to impugn the motives or purposes of the gracious and beloved lady of the White House, the first lady of the land? Not alone in her exalted position, but also in the place she has won by her graceful and lovely bearing to the people who have had the honor of her acquaintance and have observed her bearing toward all. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, and we will all of us testify to the people of the country that it was the mere joke of a young man, and that he meant nothing by it. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia having once spoken to his amendment, can only speak again to it by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia will not be adopted. I regret that it has been offered, the more so because it may be imagined that an attempt has been made to impugn the integrity of some member of the President's family. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has well said, the President's family has certain social obligations which come from his occupancy of the White House. His wife is compelled to participate in certain functions because she is the wife of the President, and services are required in connection therewith which properly belong to the force of the Executive office and must necessarily be done by the clerks there. I have no doubt that some clerk has been particularly assigned to perform the duties that come from these circumstances, and it may be that such clerk has been designated as the social secretary of the President's wife. I would be in favor of appropriating specifically for a clerk under that title, if such a clerk be necessary. [Applause.] I would do that for more than one reason, but particularly because in my opinion the salary of the President of the United States is not at all commensurate with the position he occupies. [Applause.] And if we will not give him the compensation that we should give him, we at least should prevent his salary being taxed for services required because of his official position, and because of the fact that his wife is required to perform certain duties arising from her relation to the President and the obligations of the office, the help needed should be freely given.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that is true, why is not the wife of every Cabinet minister entitled to have a social secretary? Do they not also have social duties to the American people? And why, in a smaller degree, does not the thing go all down through official life?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps it might. I might have a social secretary, the gentleman from Georgia might have one, but nobody thinks that we need them. I am sure I do not; but the President of the United States is compelled during the year to entertain the representatives of foreign nations; and not only the officials themselves, but the members of their families. Every man who has been elected President of the United States has not been so fortunate as to have been familiar with the requirements and fine distinctions to be observed in official entertainment, and it would be most unfortunate if he and the members of his family could not obtain the services of somebody who, by reason of special training, has become expert in such matters. Sometimes very grave offense may be given to representatives of foreign governments because of a failure to observe distinctions that are considered important by them. If I had my way, I would place in this bill, so that there would be no mistake, so that there would be no ground for criticism, a clerk to be known as the "social clerk."

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you not think we would have a point of order against it if it was placed in the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said if I had my way, which unfortunately for the country, is not the way of the House. [Laughter.] If I had my way, I would give this clerk—and not one, but as many as were deemed necessary—so that all of the functions at the White House, official and otherwise, might be conducted in a manner that would meet with the admiration and commendation of the entire American people.

Again, I express regret that the gentleman from Georgia has offered this amendment. He did not intend it in that way, but some unthinking people might believe that a reflection is involved upon the occupant of the White House. While nobody has been more free in criticising the present occupant of the White House for what I believe to be political and official, I hope that nobody has been more free from offering criticism on matters which are not the proper subjects of our criticism and which, in my opinon, we can well keep silent about. So I hope the gentleman from Georgia will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, just to prevent any misconception of what was intended, and withdraw this amendment; and if necessary, that he himself will offer to add to this bill a provision for a clerk to perform whatever duties are required by reason of the social functions at the White House. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. While I appreciate the difference of age and experience in this House between the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and myself, I do not propose to allow him to lecture me about this thing. He may as well realize that. While I appreciate the kindly advice of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I want to say that neither one of them, nor both of them, nor all the Members of this House, can put me in a false attitude about this amendment. We are talking about appropriations. If to object to them, if to say that a certain appropriation is not right, involves a reflection on the person who is to get the benefit of the appropriation, I will have to submit.

But, Mr. Chairman, the people of the country will never take it that way. We are appropriating the money of the people out of the Treasury of the United States. I am not attacking anybody. I come from a section of the country where nobody but a dastard and a scoundrel attacks a woman, and God knows I will not yield to anyone in my respect for the first lady of the land. [Applause.]

While I discuss a legislative question, the question of appropriating something, or taking the people's money out of the Treasury of the United States, I have not in my heart, and have not in my head, the slightest intention of reflecting on the lady at the other end of this Avenue. Not at all. I do not know that she knows anything about this; in all human probability she does not. This appropriation is in this bill, and has been allowed for some time, in an indirect way, as I am informed; and I do say that if the people of the United States wish to appropriate money in that way it would be more manly, as the gentleman from New York suggests, to vote for it straight; let us do it directly and know what we are doing, and let the people know.

Now, if any Member on the other side will show me, or state to me of his own knowledge, that in any other Administration an appropriation like this has ever been made, I will withdraw the amendment with an apology, not for a wrong intention, for there is none, but for a mistake of fact. I claim that this appropriation ought not to be made. No such appropriation is made to Cabinet officers and other people who have social duties imposed upon them by official station. It is true that this lady, by her distinguished position, has more of those duties than anybody else, but how long will it be before we will be appropriating for "social secretaries," for Cabinet ministers, and pretty soon for Senators, I expect, and possibly for Representatives, and who can tell where it will end? I think every public officer who desires his wife to have a "social secretary" should foot the bill out of his own pocket.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, on my amendment, and I will not be misrepresented; I will not be put in a false attitude by anybody, be he old or young, Democrat or Republican.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of holding a colloquy with the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill. It is now 9 minutes after 5 o'clock, and I would inquire of the gentleman if he can not move that the committee do now rise?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi and move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had directed him to report that that committee had come to no resolution thereon.

CONSULAR SERVICE, UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States, with House amendment.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania, Mr. DENBY, Mr. TOWNE.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In view of the following report from the Acting Attorney-General, I return herewith without approval House bill No. 8977:

"I have received your letter of March 12, inclosing H. R. 8977, entitled 'An act to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Del Rio, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes,' and asking to be informed whether I know of any objections to its approval.

"I wired Judge Maxey, as follows:

"'Congress has passed bill constituting counties Uvalde, Zavalla, Maverick, Kinney, Valverde, Terrell, and Pecos a division of western judicial district, and providing that terms of United States courts shall be held twice each year at Del Rio. In order that I may properly advise the President, please wire me your opinion touching necessity for proposed legislation.'

"He has replied as follows:

"'In my judgment there is no necessity whatever for a court at Del Rio. All business originating in that vicinity may be easily and expeditiously transacted at San Antonio, I think, with as little expense as at Del Rio.'

"In response to the following inquiry:

"'Please wire me immediately how many cases, civil and criminal, respectively, from the counties of Uvalde, Zavalla, Maverick, Kinney, Valverde, Terrell, and Pecos were instituted in the Federal courts in each of the five years last past'—

"The clerk of the court at San Antonio advises me:

"'Business originating in counties Uvalde, Zavalla, Maverick, Kinney, Valverde for years 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905, as follows: Criminal, sixty-four. For following offenses: Smuggling and receiving smuggled property, fifty-one; willfully destroying Government property, one; resisting customs officer, one; purchasing Government property, three; importing women, purpose prostitution, two; importing foreign labor, two; pension violation, one; being unlawfully in the United States, two; violation immigration laws, one; seizures on land (informations in rem) nine; bankruptcy, nine; circuit law cases, seven; bills in equity, five. Pecos and Terrell, latter recently organized from Pecos, not included in this statement for reason that deputy El Paso recently died and man in charge not sufficiently familiar with records to furnish data, but in fact few cases arose in those counties—not exceeding six for period mentioned.'

"I have given this matter careful consideration, have heard what the author and advocates of the bill have to say in its favor, and have also given consideration to a communication from Mr. SLAYDEN, who represents the district including San Antonio, and who opposes it.

"I am thoroughly persuaded that there is no necessity for what the bill proposes and that it should not, in the interest of the public service, become a law.

"Del Rio is a small place on the frontier and the surrounding country is sparsely settled.

"It appears that during the last five years there originated in the seven counties proposed to be included in the new division sixty-four criminal and twenty-six civil cases, most of them in the county of Maverick, in which Eagle Pass lies. This makes a yearly average of, say, thirteen criminal and five civil cases. It appears to me wholly unjustifiable to establish sessions of courts to try such a limited number of cases.

"The data furnished to this Department shows that in the last eighteen months there originated in the district included in the proposed new division eight civil and twenty-three criminal cases, of which sixteen criminal and seven civil originated in the county of Maverick.

"It is not much more inconvenient for the cases from Maverick County to go to San Antonio than to Del Rio. I do not think there is any necessity for the new division at all, but if conditions should at any time warrant another division obviously the court should be held at Eagle Pass.

"There will not be enough business in the courts at Del Rio to pay for the time of a capable deputy clerk, which the bill requires shall be stationed there. The public service is hurt very materially when the court records are inefficiently kept. Moreover, the creation of the new division will affect the income of the clerk at San Antonio and thereby impair the efficiency of that office."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 22, 1906.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the veto, with the papers, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK LOANS ON REAL ESTATE.

Mr. GILLESPIE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GILLESPIE. To ask unanimous consent to file the minority views on the bill H. R. 8124.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8124) to amend section 5136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, permitting national banking associations to make loans on real estate as security, and limiting the amount of such loans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I desire to have a change of reference of a bill for the pensioning of Thomas C. Hughes. By mistake it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions, where it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, change of reference of private bills must be made through the basket.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 952) to authorize a patent to be issued to Stephen Teichner for certain lands therein described, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The Committee on Private Land Claims was also discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2450) for the relief of settlers upon the abandoned Fort Rice Military Reservation, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

R. 11946) to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

JICARILLA APACHE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15848) authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto, to report it favorably without amendment. This is purely a local bill, and it is a bill the Department is anxious to have passed. It will not create any debate and it will take but a moment or two to pass it. I ask that it be put on its passage.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to sell or otherwise dispose of any or all of the timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation in New Mexico, whether allotted or unallotted—if allotted, with the consent of the allottee—the proceeds to be deposited in the United States Treasury, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians, in such manner as in his judgment will tend to promote their welfare and advance them in civilization.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ISLE OF PINES INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to state that the resolution I offered yesterday, which comes over regularly to-day, by an arrangement between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and myself, will go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONTRACTS WITH NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that there be printed for the use of the Senate a letter addressed to myself by the Department of Justice at Washington, inclosing copies of contracts entered into between the United States and contracts proposed to be entered into between the United States and the New Panama Canal Company. One of the documents, the last one in the series, is partly in French and partly in English. I desire to have it printed just as it is, and hereafter I will ask the Senate to authorize the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to have a translation of the French document made. I move now the printing of those papers and their reference to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Out of order, and to accommodate one or two Senators who are on subcommittees and must leave the Chamber, I ask leave now to call up my motion to insist upon the amendments of the Senate to the House bill 12707, commonly known as the "statehood bill," agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees. I do this at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to amend the motion of the Senator from Indiana by providing that the conferees shall be appointed by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, when this matter went over yesterday it was with the statement that I would confer with the Senator from Indiana with a view to reaching some agreement as to what should be the course to be taken with respect to the appointment of the conferees. I have had that conference with the Senator, with the result that I withdraw my motion and allow the conferees to be appointed in the usual way, the Senator from Indiana having given me certain assurances, which I understand he is quite willing to give to the Senate, that the action of the Senate will be faithfully represented by those who are appointed, although they voted against the main proposition which goes to conference.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, that, of course, is always involved in a motion to insist upon the amendments. The purpose of a conference is that the conferees of each House, while representing the views of its House, shall devise some method to bring the two Houses into agreement if possible, and if not to so report.

Mr. FORAKER. I think one other thing ought to be stated, perhaps, in this case. There is a bill pending here affecting Arizona, which it is understood will be called up and be disposed of at some time that shall suit the convenience of Senators before this matter is finally determined.

Mr. NELSON. To what bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. FORAKER. The bill to prohibit gambling in the Territory of Arizona, a bill that I want to have passed on by the Senate before this matter is finally determined. It is understood between us that that bill shall be acted upon.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That course is perfectly agreeable, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I may say a single word in regard to this matter. I had occasion to say something about it some time ago in the case of the immigration bill. It seems to me that it must be the absolute understanding always that conferees represent the views of the Senate and not their own views. It does seem to me that it is not possible we can carry on business upon any other basis; that the Senators in charge of the bill, even if they voted against the amendments of the Senate, would, of course, represent the views of the Senate, and that the bill should not be taken from the committee in charge of the measure.

Mr. FORAKER. In answer to that suggestion, if it is intended that it should involve any criticism of me for making the motion I did, I want to say——

Mr. LODGE. I did not intend to intimate that.

Mr. FORAKER. The motion I made was simply that the conferees should be appointed in compliance with the rule of the Senate, as I understand it, instead of the way we have drifted into, of having them appointed, by unanimous consent, by the Chair. I understand the rule of the Senate which I sought to evoke in this instance would but give those of us who were thinking there ought to be such action taken the benefit of the general rule that obtains, laid down by all parliamentary writers, that those who are the friends of a proposition should go to the conference to represent it.

But I do not wish to discuss it at all. I only want to call attention to the fact that the motion was made in perfect good faith, without reference to the personality of any Senator or his attitude in respect to any measure except only in so far as it pertains to the public business.

I wish to say one other thing. What I suggested should be done in this case is not without precedent. I remember, as all Senators who were here then must very well remember, that we had quite a controversy over this proposition in connection with the adoption of the joint resolution upon which we intervened in Cuba. The Chair at that time recognized the right of those favoring the proposition to be represented as the conferees, and they were appointed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio having withdrawn his proposed amendment, the question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Chair appoint the conferees.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two on this occasion. I have just come from a committee meeting and I do not know exactly what has been done; but I understood yesterday that the Senator from Ohio intended to withdraw his motion. I understood then that he would withdraw it because some members of the committee felt that it was a reflection on the committee to select as conferees anyone outside of the committee. I do not know but that some felt it was a reflection upon the presiding officer of the Senate.

Mr. President, the right to appoint the members of a conference committee belongs to the Senate. I am not going to find any fault with the withdrawal of the motion made by the Senator from Ohio; I agreed to its withdrawal last night. But I wish to say that it is no reflection upon a committee nor is it any reflection upon the Chair, because we recognize that without a motion to that effect the Chair has not the right to appoint a committee. The right to appoint the members of a conference committee is with the body that creates the committee. That is not always done, because it is convenient generally—and the custom has grown up to that effect—for the chairman of the committee to designate certain members of the committee having charge of the measure to act at the conference. The conferees of the two Houses are then supposed to represent the Senate or the House, as the case may be.

I understand also there is a feeling on the part of some members of the committee that to select anyone off of the committee or to select anyone even on the committee who had not been favorable to the first proposition perhaps would be a reflection on the committee. Whenever a conference committee is created it is created to bring the mind of the other body to that of this body, and to bring them together. It is not to represent the view of the minority, but to represent, if possible, the majority. Upon that theory the majority of the proposition that passes this body is entitled by custom and usage and on principle to name the committee. A majority only of this body can pass a bill. If the bill is different from what came from the House, the bill as it leaves this body is supposed to represent the sentiment of this body, and this body then is entitled to have a friendly committee.

I am not going to complain of anything that has been done. I am quite willing to submit to the chairman of the committee the right in this case to make the selection according to what has been somewhat the custom here. I heard Senators say around me yesterday that they thought a different course would be a reflection upon the committee, and therefore they could not favor it. I only want to enter a protest against hampering the Senate, whenever it chooses to exercise a right which belongs to it beyond any question, to select its conferees independent of the chairman of the committee and independent of the presiding officer.

So far have the English authorities gone on this subject in Parliament that they have declared that it was the duty, when a man was put on a conference committee or on any other committee to deal with a subject to which he was hostile, to refuse to become a member of the conference committee or any other committee. As was said by a distinguished English writer on parliamentary law, and as is quoted approvingly in Jefferson's Manual, "the child is not to be put to a nurse that cares not for it." Upon that principle the party that puts the bill through, whether it be an original bill or an amended bill, is entitled to name the committee. That has been done repeatedly in the Senate over and over again, and it is only practically recently—when I say recently I do not mean within the last five years, I mean in modern times—that the custom has grown up to allow the chairman of the committee, however hostile he may be to the bill as it passes the Senate, to designate who shall deal with the House in the effort by a conference to bring the House to the sentiment of the Senate. Everyone can see that logically the friends of the measure are the proper ones to represent the matter to the conferees on the part of the House and win them to the Senatorial mind.

I have said this, Mr. President, simply in the interest of what I consider to be the orderly and proper management of the business of the Senate, not by way of any reflection on the Senator who presides over the committee or because I have the slightest objection to the arrangement, friendly in its character, which was made yesterday by the friends on the other side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BEVERIDGE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. PATTERSON.

QUARANTINE AT PANAMA.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a letter from the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service relating to quarantine at Panama, which is in a state of confusion. I ask that the letter be read and that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and also to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 22, 1906.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 16, which was delayed in reaching me.

In reply to your inquiries concerning quarantine conditions in the Canal Zone, I have to state that before the purchase of the canal strip was consummated, under the act of February 15, 1893, medical officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service were detailed—one in the office of the American consul at Panama and another in the office of the American consul at Colon—to inspect vessels bound for the United States proper and sign bills of health in conjunction with the American consul. Shortly after it became evident that the Panama authorities were not properly conducting quarantine against incoming vessels, and that there was great danger of the introduction of infectious disease from South American countries at both Panama and Colon. The facts were brought to the attention of the State Department. Through representation by said Department, the Panama authorities readily turned over the administration of the incoming quarantine at both cities to the officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service who were stationed in the two consulates.

When the Isthmian Canal Commission took control of the Canal Zone it assumed the function of quarantine with other functions, and requested that the officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service serving as above mentioned be turned over to the Commission. These officers were accordingly made to report direct to the chairman of the Commission, who directed them to report to the chief sanitary officer of the Commission. The latter placed them in charge of the incoming quarantine at Panama and Colon.

The Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, however, still has its representatives in the consular offices in Panama and Colon to sign the bills of health and to see that the Treasury regulations are enforced with regard to vessels and persons leaving said ports for the United States.

With regard to the Canal Zone itself, its sanitation is directly under the Commission. Two of its principal officers, namely, the director of hospitals and the chief quarantine officer, are officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service loaned to the Commission.

The above is the situation as it exists at the present time. Enclosed is a page from the annual report of this Service for 1904, in which is set forth the matter above mentioned.

Respectfully,
WALTER WYMAN,
Surgeon-General.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and also to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

ENGAGEMENT AT MOUNT DAJO, ISLAND OF JOLO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CULBERSON, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to send to the Senate full copies of all reports and all other communications which have passed to this date between the officials of the United States in the United States and any such officials in the Philippine Islands respecting the recent attack by troops of the United States on Mount Dajo.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being House bill 12987.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I acknowledge my obligation to the Senate for the courtesy which permits me to resume the discussion of this subject to-day. I could not have finished it yesterday. I am extremely anxious to be through with it; but with leave of the Senate, to prevent any misunderstanding which may have arisen from irrelevant interruptions or from any misrepresentation, I wish to restate in a few words the proposition for which I contend.

In the Sewing Machine cases, in 18 Wallace, it is said:

> The circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Constitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend—
> The jurisdiction of the circuit court—
> upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction in controversies between party and party but such as the statute confers. Congress, it may be conceded, may confer such jurisdiction upon the circuit courts as it may see fit, within the scope of the judicial power of the Constitution, not vested in the Supreme Court, but as such tribunals are neither created by the Constitution nor is their jurisdiction defined by that instrument, it follows that inasmuch as they are created by an act of Congress it is necessary, in every attempt to define their power, to look to that source as the means of accomplishing that end. Federal judicial power, beyond all doubt, has its origin—
> That is italicized in the opinion of the court—
> in the Constitution, but the organization of the system and the distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction among such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish within the scope of the judicial power, always have been, and of right must be, the work of the Congress. (Case of the Sewing Machine Companies, 18 Wall., p. 577.)

Upon that basis, Mr. President, I am making the contention which rests entirely upon what I conceive to be a clear distinction between jurisdiction and judicial power.

What is the judicial power of the Constitution, Mr. President? Mr. Justice Miller has defined it, taking the definition from the Supreme Court:

> What is judicial power? It will not do to answer that it is the power exercised by the courts, because one of the very things to be determined is what power they may exercise. It is, indeed, very difficult to find any exact definition made to hand. It is not to be found in any of the old treatises of any of the old English authorities or judicial decisions, for a very obvious reason. While in a general way it may be true that they had this division between legislative and judicial power, yet their legislature was, nevertheless, in the habit of exercising a very large part of the latter. The House of Lords was often the court of appeals, and Parliament was in the habit of passing bills of attainder as well as enacting convictions for treason and other crimes.

That system, Mr. President, was not brought from the other side by the fathers into our Constitution, but fundamental and well carried out was their purpose to draw clear and distinct the line which would separate the legislative power from the executive power, and both from the judicial power.

> Judicial power is, perhaps, better defined in some of the reports of our own courts than in any other place, and especially so in the Supreme Court of the United States, because it has more often been the subject of comment there, and its consideration more frequently necessary to the determination of questions arising in that court than anywhere else.
> What is it?
> It is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision.

My proposition is, Mr. President, that when jurisdiction over any one of the enumerated cases is conferred upon the court, the judicial power of the Constitution goes with it, and that it is not in the power of Congress, while it might have withheld the jurisdiction, to invade at all the judicial function of hearing and determination and the exercise of those powers—incidental, if you please—essential to carrying into effect its decisions.

Given the jurisdiction, Mr. President, over the subject-matter and the parties, how the judicial power shall be exercised can not lawfully be controlled in any degree by the legislature. Dictation to courts and judges as to the decisions which they shall make, by legislature or executive, is not to be tolerated. When the chancellor decides that a just exercise of judicial power, which he is sworn to administer, demands a relief which is part of the judicial power, an appellate court, if he errs, may correct him. The legislature can not reverse his decree or exercise the judicial power for him, in whole or in part. Courts do not sit to execute legislative judgments or decrees. If it were otherwise, we would not be living under the Government which our fathers created, or in the times in which we live, but would be carried back a century and more, when Parliament passed bills of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, and the like.

It is well to recall what Mr. Webster said, in his great argument in the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat., 518) in regard to the power of the legislature in this connection. He said:

> It shall not judge by act. It shall not decide by act, but it shall leave all these things to be tried and adjudged by the law of the land. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not, therefore, to be considered the law of the land. Such a construction would render constitutional provisions of the highest importance completely inoperative and void. It would tend directly to establish the union of all powers in the legislature. There would be no general permanent law for courts to administer, or for men to live under. The administration of justice would be an empty form, an idle ceremony. Judges would sit to execute legislative judgments and decrees, not to declare the law or to administer the justice of the country.

Happily we have been very free from attempted Congressional usurpation of judicial power, but not absolutely so. The Congress attempted, Mr. President, in one instance to dictate to the Supreme Court in what manner the judicial power vested in it by the Constitution and laws should be exercised. It is an instructive case, and brings into bright light the distinction between judicial power and jurisdiction. It will be remembered that the Constitution gives to the Supreme Court "appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." By this language the Congress is invested with quite unrestricted power over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The case of the United States v. Klein (13 Wall., 128) arose under the captured and abandoned property act. To make a short statement of the case, it had been held by the Supreme Court that the pardon granted by the President had blotted out the offense of giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the Republic, and the proof of loyalty, therefore, was not necessary to entitle the suitor to recover proceeds of the sale of captured and abandoned cotton which had belonged to him, and the proceeds of which the court had determined were held in trust for the benefit of loyal owners. Judgment had gone in favor of the claimant in the Court of Claims, from which appeal was permitted by Congress to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the meantime Congress passed an act epitomized by the Supreme Court as follows:

> The substance of this enactment is that an acceptance of a pardon without disclaimer shall be conclusive evidence of the acts pardoned, but shall be null and void as evidence of the rights conferred by it, both in the Court of Claims and in this court on appeal.

Of this act the court said:

> Undoubtedly the legislature has complete control over the organization and existence of that court and may confer or withhold the right of appeal from its decisions. And if this act did nothing more, it would be our duty to give it effect. If it simply denied the right of appeal in a particular class of cases, there could be no doubt that it must be regarded as an exercise of the power of Congress to make "such exceptions from the appellate jurisdiction" as should seem to it expedient.
> But the language of the proviso shows plainly that it does not intend to withhold appellate jurisdiction except as a means to an end. Its great and controlling purpose is to deny to pardons granted by the President the effect which this court had adjudged them to have. The proviso declares that pardons shall not be considered by this court on appeal. We had already decided that it was our duty to consider them and give them effect, in cases like the present, as equivalent to proof of loyalty. It provides that whenever it shall appear that any judgment of the Court of Claims shall have been founded on such pardons, without other proof of loyalty, the Supreme Court shall have no further jurisdiction of the case and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction. The proviso further declares that every pardon granted to any suitor in the Court of Claims and reciting that the person pardoned has been guilty of any act of rebellion or disloyalty shall, if accepted in writing without disclaimer of the fact recited, be taken as conclusive evidence in that court and on appeal of the act recited; and on proof of pardon or acceptance, summarily made on motion or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court shall cease and the suit shall be forthwith dismissed.
> It is evident from this statement that the denial of jurisdiction to this court, as well as to the Court of Claims, is founded solely on the application of a rule of decision, in causes pending, prescribed by Congress.
> The court has jurisdiction of the cause to a given point; but when it ascertains that a certain state of things exists, its jurisdiction is to cease, and it is required to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction. It seems to us that this is not an exercise of the acknowledged power of Congress to make exceptions and prescribe regulations to the appellate power.
> The court is required to ascertain the existence of certain facts and thereupon to declare that its jurisdiction on appeal has ceased by dismissing the bill. What is this but to prescribe a rule for the decision of a cause in a particular way? In the case before us the Court of Claims has rendered judgment for the claimant and an appeal has been taken to this court. We are directed to dismiss the appeal, if we find that the judgment must be affirmed, because of a pardon granted to the intestate of the claimants. Can we do so without allowing one party to the controversy to decide it in its own favor? Can we do so without allowing that the legislature may prescribe rules of decision to the judicial department of the Government in cases pending before it?
> We think not; and thus thinking, we do not at all question what was decided in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company. (18 How., 429; 59 U. S., XV, 456.) In that case, after a decree in this court that the bridge, in the then state of the law, was a nuisance and must be abated as such, Congress passed an act legalizing the structure and making it a post-road; and the court, on a motion for process to enforce the decree, held that the bridge had ceased to be a nuisance by the exercise of the constitutional powers of Congress, and denied the motion. No arbitrary rule of decision was prescribed in that case, but the court was left to apply its ordinary rules to the new circumstances created by the act. In the case before us no new circumstances have been created by legislation. But the court is forbidden to give the effect to evidence which, in its own judgment, such evidence should have, and is directed to give it an effect precisely contrary.
> We must think that Congress has inadvertently passed the limit which separates the legislative from the judicial power.
> It is of vital importance that these powers be kept distinct. The Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish. The same instrument, in the last clause of the same article, provides that in all cases other than those of original jurisdiction "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."
> Congress has already provided that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of the judgments of the Court of Claims on appeal. Can it prescribe a rule in conformity with which the court must deny to itself the jurisdiction thus conferred, because, and only because, its decision, in accordance with settled law, must be adverse to the Government and favorable to the suitor? This question seems to us to answer itself.

I need not pursue it. It was for Congress to permit or deny the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It had entire control over that matter. It could do either, but it could not do both. It could not grant a conditional appeal, nor could it use the power which it possessed to grant an appeal to control the judicial power possessed by the Supreme Court under the Constitution. It could not do this in the slightest degree. Here is the true distinction, and it is vital, Mr. President.

Congress may withhold, or might have withheld, jurisdiction from the circuit courts in certain cases. They did it for many years, and we may admit they may now withhold jurisdiction from the circuit and district courts; but, Mr. President, so long as they do not deprive the court of jurisdiction, so long as looking into the statute the court can see that it is given jurisdiction of the subject-matter, Congress can not be permitted, on principle—a principle which this people never must suffer to be invaded or abrogated—to dictate to the court the manner in which it shall exercise this judicial power. That would be to emasculate the courts of justice; that would be to obliterate the line which the Constitution has drawn between the coordinate and independent branches of the Government. Under that theory the judicial department of the Government would cease to be an independent department of the Government, and a blow would be struck at the best work of the fathers.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], in the very able and lawyer-like argument which he delivered here the other day, noted clearly and approved the distinction for which I am contending between jurisdiction and judicial power.

Mr. Justice Miller, a great judge, whose career as a justice of the Supreme Court added greatly to the just fame which throughout the world that tribunal has achieved for itself during its existence, said a word in his lectures on the Constitution upon the subject of the abolition of the inferior tribunals. Of course, he announced that it is beyond the power of Congress, as all concede, to destroy the Supreme Court of the United States, for that was directly created by the Constitution, although organized of necessity by the Congress. He says:

> It can not be abolished nor its judges legislated out of existence, although it has been forcibly argued, and probably with truth, that all the other courts can by legislative act be abolished and their powers conferred on other courts or subdivided in different modes.

It is said that the circuit courts and district courts of the United States were prohibited by the judiciary act from granting injunctions. In one case, yes—to restrain proceedings in State courts—and it is claimed that that is a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution and supports the power of Congress contended for now, while the jurisdiction in equity exists to whittle away the judicial power of the Constitution in equity. The exception to that prohibition was in bankruptcy cases. It may be said about that prohibition that under our system of Government, different from the government in which grew up the English chancery system, there were good reasons and strong reasons peculiar to our form of Government which led the Congress of that day, to prohibit injunctions to restrain proceedings in State courts, because we have States.

Mr. MORGAN. And they have sovereignty.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; imperium in imperio. There is the sovereignty of the United States and the sovereignty of the States. The Constitution recognizes, of course, their sovereignty; and in order to avoid friction between the courts of the Union and the courts of the States it was wise, and in no degree diminished the chancery power which came to us through the Constitution, that the Congress should not permit unlimitedly the circuit and district courts of the United States to enjoin proceedings in the State courts.

This provision, enacted in 1793, is still the law. It is section 720 of the Revised Statutes and is as follows:

> The writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided more than once that, notwithstanding this plain prohibition to prevent friction between the courts of the United States and of the States, it possesses power to enjoin proceedings in the State courts not in bankruptcy, where such injunction is essential to the protection and exercise of its jurisdiction and to the giving effect to its decrees.

Mr. MORGAN. May I take the liberty of making a suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Wisconsin, as I understand, has contended that the power of injunction is one of the constituent powers of a court of equity and has been ever since such courts were founded. The powers of a court of equity are judicial. They are not political. The power that was mentioned and restrained in the judiciary act was a political power, and the purpose was to prevent the court from exercising political power over the coordinate sovereignties of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. In the same way and following the line of suggestion which the Senator from Alabama makes, the judiciary act conferred upon the courts of the United States the power to grant all writs necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction. That did not, and never has been held, to authorize the inferior courts of the United States to issue writs of mandamus in all cases.

The writ of mandamus at the common law was a high prerogative writ. It has become in later years—

> More and more assimilated to an ordinary remedy to the use of which the parties are entitled as of right. It was in this sense that Tawney, C. J., characterized it in modern practice as nothing more than an action at law between the parties. (24 Howard, 66.)
> It is still an extraordinary remedy at law, in the same sense that injunction is in equity. The injunction is preventive and conservative, its object being to preserve matters in statu quo. Mandamus is remedial, tending to compel action and redress past grievances.

The Congress was not willing, nor was it needful, to confer upon the United States circuit courts by the judiciary act the general power to grant writs of mandamus. It has been so held. But they did confer the power to grant it wherever necessary to the efficient exercise of the judicial power vested in the courts. It is a necessary writ oftentimes for the control of the inferior tribunals.

Returning to the matter of the injunction, of which I was speaking when interrupted by the Senator from Alabama with a valuable suggestion, I call attention to the case of Julian v. The Central Trust Company (193 United States, 94). The syllabus sufficiently states the case:

> A purchaser of property sold under a decree of foreclosure in a Federal court in cases where the Federal court by its decree retains jurisdiction to settle all liens and claims upon the property, and who is in possession of the property under an order confirming the sale, can maintain an action in the same court to restrain the holders of judgments obtained in State courts against the former owner in actions to which the purchaser was not a party from levying upon and selling the property described in the decree of foreclosure and the order confirming the sale thereunder.

The courts say:

> If the sheriff is allowed to sell the very property conveyed by the Federal decree such action has the effect to annul and set it aside, because in the view of the State court it was ineffectual to pass the title to the purchaser. In such cases we are of the opinion that a supplemental bill may be filed in the original suit, with a view to protecting the prior jurisdiction of the Federal court, and to render effectual its decree. (59 Fed. Rep., 385; 88 Fed. Rep., 815; 110 Fed. Rep., 10.)
> In such cases where the Federal court acts in aid of its own jurisdiction and to render its decree effectual, it may, notwithstanding section 720, restrain all proceedings in a State court which would have the effect of defeating or impairing its jurisdiction. (Sharon v. Terry, 36 Fed. Rep., 337, per Mr. Justice Field; French v. Hay, 22 Wallace, 250; Dietzsch v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S., 494.)

In cases of concurrent jurisdiction it has always been held that the court whose jurisdiction first attached held it, and it has been repeatedly decided that in such case the Federal court may issue the writ of injunction in order to protect its jurisdiction and to enable it to exercise efficiently the judicial power vested in it by the Constitution.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say, on another point, that I myself brought that suit to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I know it, and I was going to refer to that fact.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say that I have seen the abuses and felt the iron hand of a judge who grants an injunction without notice. I have twice been enjoined at midnight——

Mr. SPOONER. That is another thing.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the State court itself was enjoined without any notice. I merely wanted to illustrate it, that is all.

Mr. SPOONER. That is another thing. The Senator from North Carolina, I understand, has introduced an amendment to the pending bill, prohibiting the granting of an injunction without notice in suits brought under the proposed act to enjoin the enforcement of the Commission's order. That goes to a regulation of practice. That does not deny in any sense the right of the court to exercise the judicial power which inheres in the jurisdiction. There is a clear distinction between the two things. Congress for many years prohibited the Federal courts from granting an injunction without reasonable notice, as I have said.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that that decision held that the United States court having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter, although the case had gone off the docket, in order to protect its own decree it had the right to enjoin the State court.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the very point. Notwithstanding the prohibition that no injunction shall be issued by a Federal court to stay proceedings in a State court except in bankruptcy cases, it has been repeatedly decided that to effectuate the judicial power of the Federal court, to give force to its decrees, and to protect its jurisdiction in the very nature of the thing the court must exercise this power.

Mr. OVERMAN. And protect the title of those who bought under the decree.

Mr. SPOONER. That is giving effect to their decree; that is all.

Mr. President, without the power to protect its jurisdiction, without the power to exercise the functions essential to the jurisdiction, what would a court be? And to say that jurisdiction admitted, the Congress can hamper the court in the exercise of its judicial power, chop off a piece of it here and a piece of it there, is something which is not to be tolerated under our system of government, in my judgment.

Mr. President, I put against all comers on this question the statement of Mr. Justice Story in the case to which I called attention yesterday—Martin v. Hunter, reported in 1 Wheaton—at the end of an elaborate argument on the construction of the judicial clauses of the Constitution:

> But even admitting that the language of the Constitution is not mandatory and that Congress may constitutionally omit to vest the judicial power in courts of the United States, it can not be denied that when it is vested it may be exercised to the utmost constitutional extent.

That was one of the first opinions of the Supreme Court in the construction of the judicial clauses of the Constitution. It found its way in extenso into Judge Story's Commentaries upon the Constitution. No one of the great judges who sat with him on that bench, save Mr. Justice Johnson, criticised anything in that opinion. It is not to be supposed that Chief Justice Marshall was not familiar with it; that Mr. Justice Washington was not familiar with it; that Mr. Justice Livingston was not familiar with it; and had it not met their concurrence it is sure, from the practice of the judges of that day, that the dissent from its argument, even if its conclusions were approved, would have found its way into the reports. Mr. Justice Johnson criticised a portion of the opinion, although not that portion of it.

Now, I have found nothing in any utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States since that day which warrants me, Mr. President, in the belief that this distinction between jurisdiction and judicial power under the Constitution is not an abiding one, firmly embedded in the jurisprudence of the United States. It is that principle which makes the courts independent of Congress; it is that principle—the power to hear and determine and to carry into effect its decrees and judgments independent of popular clamor, independent of prejudice—that has made the court always, and so it will always be, the rock upon which this constitutional Government finds its sure and safe foundation. Break away from it and admit the power to strike down this function and that function of the chancellor; give him jurisdiction to grant a permanent injunction; deny him the power in the exercise of that jurisdiction by preliminary injunction in a proper case to prevent the doing of the irremediable wrong which the suit is brought to prevent and what is left of the courts? Only what Congress may see fit to leave of the court.

I agree that, so far as the power of Congress over the inferior courts of the United States is concerned, there is probably no distinction between the courts of equity and the courts of law. I do not see that there is. If the Congress can destroy one, directly or indirectly, I see no reason why it might not destroy the other.

I will go briefly over the cases cited as contravening my contention. I first note Connecticut v. New York (4 Dallas). What was held in that case was simply this:

> The prohibition contained in the statute that writs of injunction shall not be granted without reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney, extends to injunctions granted by the Supreme Court or the circuit court as well as those that may be granted by a single judge.

That may be admitted. It has nothing to do with this question.

It was held in the same case:

> An injunction will not be granted to stay proceedings in common law suits, at the instance of a State not a party thereto nor interested in their decision.

This was obviously rightly decided and is far away from any question involved here.

Turner v. The Bank (4 Dallas) was rightly decided. The judiciary act had provided that the Federal courts should not have jurisdiction of a suit brought by the assignee of a chose in action where it would not have had jurisdiction if the assignor had brought the suit. I can conceive of two reasons, both founded in wisdom, why that provision was incorporated in the judiciary act. However, it affected the question of jurisdiction only; not the question of judicial power. But for that prohibition, constant fraud could have been perpetrated on the Federal jurisdiction and great hardship could have been perpetrated on debtors. If one by the mere assignment of a note to a person in another State could force the debtor from the local jurisdiction into a foreign jurisdiction, with the added burden of trouble and expense, it would have been a wrong to the citizen of the State; it would have been a fraud upon the jurisdiction of the Federal court. Colorable assignments for purposes of jurisdiction could have been prevented in no other way, but what has that to do, I beg to ask, with the question I am discussing? I think nothing.

In United States v. Hudson (7 Cranch) it was held:

The courts of the United States have no common-law jurisdiction—

It was a question of jurisdiction— in cases of libel against the Government of the United States; but they have the power to fine for contempt, to imprison for contumacy, etc.

The court held that jurisdiction had not been conferred. That case was questioned by several of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States v. Coolidge (1 Wheaton, 415), and the syllabus in that case upon the same subject starts with a "quaere."

In McIntire v. Wood (7 Cranch, 504) the syllabus correctly sets forth the question involved and the determination of the court, thus:

The power of the circuit courts of the United States to issue the writs of mandamus is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction.

The application was for a writ of mandamus to the register of the land office in Ohio, commanding him to issue final certificate of purchase to the plaintiff for certain lands in that State. The court held that the judiciary act had not conferred upon the circuit courts of the United States the power to issue writs of mandamus in all cases, but, on the other hand, confined that power exclusively to those cases in which the writ was necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. I have said in another part of my argument all that needs to be said of this case. It certainly does not bear in the slightest against the argument and conclusion of Mr. Justice Story, or upon the matter in controversy.

I am unable, saying it with great deference, to find in the decision in Cary v. Curtis (3 Howard, 236) anything, either in the question decided or in the opinion, sustaining the proposition that Congress, having vested the jurisdiction in equity over a case or controversy to which the judicial power extends under the Constitution, can deprive the court of any authority inhering in the judicial power over the subject-matter or essential to its exercise. The case was in assumpsit against Curtis, as collector of the port of New York, for duties alleged to have been illegally exacted. It had been held in the case of Elliott v. Swartwout (10 Peters, 158) that—

Where money is illegally demanded and received by an agent he can not exonerate himself from personal responsibility by paying it over to his principal.

And in the case of Bend v. Hoyt (13 Peters, 267) that—

There is no doubt the collector is generally liable, in an action to recover back an excess of duties paid to him as collector, where the duties have been illegally demanded and a protest of the illegality has been made at the time of payment, or notice then given that the party means to contest the claim, whether he has paid over the money to the Government or not.

This decision was based upon the assumption that, by notice to the collector or by protest aginst payment, the personal liability for the duties actually paid attaches, and that for his protection the correspondent right of retainer is created on his part in order to protect himself against the liability.

The Congress then passed an act providing that from and after its passage all money paid to any collector of customs, etc., for unascertained duties, or for duties paid under protest against the rate or amount of duties charged, should be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, kept, and disposed of as all other money paid for duties, as required by law or by regulation of the Treasury Department, and that it should not be held by said collector to await any ascertainment of duties or the result of any litigation in relation to the rate or amount of duty legally chargeable and equitable, but that wherever it should be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that, in case of unascertained duties or duties paid under protest, more money had been paid to the collector than the law required should have been paid, it should be the Secretary's duty to draw his warrant upon the Treasurer in favor of the person or persons entitled to the overpayment, directing the said Treasurer to refund the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The question was whether this act of Congress had so changed the situation as to render the collector no longer liable in assumpsit, upon the authority of the cases of Elliott v. Swartwout and Bend v. Hoyt. The court held that it had, for two reasons. First, that the Treasurer no longer possessed the right to retain the money to protect himself against a successful action in assumpsit; that by forbidding him to retain for unascertained duties the moneys paid he had become "by law the mere instrument or vehicle to convey the duties paid into his hands into the Treasury;" that the payment was with notice of the law, and that no implied promise on the part of the officer upon which assumpsit could be based could arise where the law expressly made it his duty to pay the money at once to the Treasurer and forbade his retaining it to indemnify himself against loss through litigation. The court held, moreover, that—

In devising a system for appraising and collecting the public revenue, it was competent for Congress to designate the officer of the Government in whom the rights of that Government should be represented in any conflict which might arise and to prescribe the manner of trial.

The court held, moreover, that the claimant was not without other modes of redress had he chosen to adopt them; that he might have asserted his right to the possession of the good or his exemption from the duties demanded, either by replevin or in an action of detinue, or perhaps by an action of trover, upon his tendering the amount of duties admitted by him to be legally due.

The court held, also, that it was entirely competent for the Government to refuse to consent to be sued in its own courts.

The language of the opinion that it was competent for the court to deprive a citizen of the right to maintain an action in assumpsit against the collector under the circumstances is far away from holding that if the assumpsit had been permitted Congress could have regulated the exercise of the judicial power in the trial of the cause. The language of the opinion, of course, is to be read with reference to the case and the questions involved in it. After using the language which is quoted against my contention, the court says:

Perfectly consistent with such an admission is the truth that the organization of the judicial power, definition, and distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction in the Federal tribunals, and the modes of their action and authority, have been, and of right must be, the work of the legislature.

It was a question of jurisdiction. The Congress had seen fit in the exercise of undoubted power to clothe the Secretary of the Treasury instead of the courts with the investigation and determination of such cases.

The case falls fairly within the language of Mr. Justice Curtis in the case of Denn v. The Hoboken Land and Improvement Company (18 Howard, 272):

To avoid misconstruction upon so grave a subject, we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which from its nature is the subject of a suit at the common law or in equity or admiralty; or, on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter which from its nature is not a subject for judicial determination. At the same time there are matters involving public rights which may be presented in such form that the judicial power is capable of acting on them, and which are susceptible of judicial determination, but which Congress may, or may not, bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States as it may deem proper. Equitable claims to land by the inhabitants of ceded territories form a striking instance of such a class of cases, and as it depends upon the will of Congress whether a remedy in the courts shall be allowed at all in such cases, they may regulate it and prescribe such rules of determination as they may think just and needful.

In Sheldon v. Sill (8 Howard) it was held:

Where the mortgagor and mortgagee resided in the same State and the mortgagee assigned the mortgage to the citizen of another State, this assignee could not file his bill for foreclosure in the circuit court of the United States.

Affirming Turner v. Bank, McIntire v. Wood, and some other cases. I have already sufficiently referred to them.

The Sewing Machine cases, so often referred to here, an extract from which I read this morning, involved simply the question whether that case was removable from the State court to the Federal court under the removal act of Congress, and the court held it was not. That was a question of jurisdiction; only that and nothing more.

The case of Insurance Company v. Dunn (19 Wallace) is precisely the same case. It arose upon the challenged right of removal, and the court held that under the act of Congress it could not be removed. Only a question of jurisdiction. The right of removal of a case or suit from the State court is a statutory one.

I find nothing in the case of Fink v. O'Neil (106 U. S., 272), which to my mind affects the question. In that case the United States as plaintiff obtained a judgment in a common-law cause in the circuit court of the United States for Wisconsin against O'Neil. Execution was issued, and the marshal levied it upon property, which under the constitution and laws of Wisconsin was exempt from sale on execution. A bill was filed by the defendant to restrain the marshal from further proceedings under the execution. The Supreme Court sustained the bill on demurrer. The statutory exemption had been enacted—

In compliance with a constitutional injunction wherein it was declared, in the seventeenth section of the Bill of Rights, that "the privilege of a debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life shall be recognized by wholesome laws."

It had been the constant policy of the State in such legislation, as construed by the Supreme Court, to favor by liberal interpretation exemptions in favor of the debtor. The court had stated—

For it can not be denied that in all the enactments found in our statute books in regard to homestead exemption the most sedulous care is manifest to secure the homestead to the debtor and to his wife and family against all debts not expressly charged upon it.

The law of the United States required the practice, pleadings, forms and mode of proceeding in civil cases other than equity and admiralty causes in the circuit and district courts to conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts were held, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding. The same act—Revised Statutes, section 916, provided that the party recovering a judgment in any common-law cause in any circuit or district court—

Shall be entitled to similar remedies upon the same by execution or otherwise to reach the property of the judgment debtor as are now provided in like causes by the laws of the State in which such court is held, or by any such laws hereafter enacted which may be adopted by general rules of such circuit or district court, and such courts may from time to time by general rule adopt such State laws as may hereafter be enforced in such States in relation to remedies upon judgments as aforesaid, by execution or otherwise.

The main question in the case was, whether the Government, being the suitor, it could be held bound by the law, even if private suitors were bound by it. The court held, to state it briefly—

That, as the statute of Wisconsin exempting homesteads from levy and sale upon execution was in force at the time the act of Congress of June 1, 1872, took effect, and has remained so continuously from that time, it also follows that the exemption has thereby become the law of the United States within that State, and applies to executions issued upon judgments in civil causes recovered in their courts in their own name and behalf equal with those for judgments rendered in favor of private parties.

It was clearly competent for the Congress to regulate the practice in the Federal courts and to make them conform as nearly as practicable in the common-law cases to the practice and procedure, including final process, of the several States. This was a wise exercise of Congressional power, as it enabled the bar, accustomed to the trial of causes under codes of procedure, or under the common-law practice, or civil-law procedure, as the case might be, to conduct the proceedings in the Federal courts as they were daily accustomed to conduct them in the State courts.

Upon high grounds of public policy, to prevent friction and promote justice and equality within a State, the Congress wisely adopted the beneficent homestead exemption laws of the States. It would have been almost intolerable that a homestead should be exempt from sale and seizure under process issued by State courts and be subject to seizure and sale under process issued by Federal courts sitting in the same State.

It is one thing for Congress to respect the exemption laws of a State. It is an entirely different thing to assert that this involves the proposition that Congress may, having created Federal tribunals, prohibit them from issuing any process to carry into effect their judgments and decrees. The one respects the policy of the States; the other would knock the foundation out from under the court itself. Without such an act of Congress a result would come about deplorable and in every way to be avoided. It is thus stated by the court:

If a contrary construction to the process acts should be given, on the ground that they do not include the United States, which, although a litigant, continues nevertheless to exercise the prerogatives of a sovereign, it would follow that they might resort to any writ known to the common law, however antiquated or obsolete, and, in defiance of the progress of enlightened legislation on that subject, revive all the hardships of imprisonment for debt, even without liberty of local statutory jail limits.

In Ex parte Robinson (19 Wallace) the court decided that—

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. Its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power.

The court, however, says in that case that happily the Congress has regulated the exercise of the power. Congress, by the act of 1831, drew a distinction between direct and constructive attempts and regulated the procedure. Still, under that law, ever since it was enacted the courts of the United States have possessed the power to punish summarily for contempt, contempt in the court room, contempt in disobedience to lawful orders and decrees, the procedure in one case differing a little from the procedure in the other. But to this matter of contempt as to procedure and punishment the relation of the United States is peculiar. The contempt of court is not a personal offense against the judge. If it were a personal offense against the judge, no judge could punish a contempt, for he would be sitting in judgment in a matter involving his own person and his own dignity. Contempt of court is an offense against the court. It is an offense which can be pardoned the United States. It is an offense against the United States, being subject, as other offenses, to pardon by the President by the President. It is more than a mere process like injunction or execution, and being an offense against the United dent, being triable by the judge in whose presence the offense is committed, it is sui generis considered with reference to the other matters to which I have alluded.

Now, because the Congress passed a law regulating the procedure in cases of contempt, will it be argued by anyone that it follows that the Congress may pass a valid enactment prohibiting any court of the United States from punishing for contempt? Does any Senator claim that? That would be to bring the courts into contempt. That would be to destroy the courts. That is a power which, in the Debs case, Mr. Justice Brewer declares to be inherent in a court.

He quotes, with approval, the following:

The summary power to commit and punish for contempt tending to obstruct or degrade the administration of justice was inherent in courts of chancery and other superior courts as essential to the execution of their powers and to the maintenance of their authority, and is part of the law of the land, within the meaning of Magna Charta and of the twelfth article of our Declaration of Rights. (In re Debs, 158 U. S., 577.)

There can be no court without it, and while it may be regulated as to the matter of procedure, I do not doubt if the Congress should pass a law prohibiting the courts of the United States from punishing for contempts in any case, the courts would not hesitate to declare it beyond the legislative power. The courts are the judges of their own jurisdiction. The courts would be justified in saying, "Destroy the court in a manly, straightforward way, if you have power; you will answer to the people for that; but so long as the courts exist, so long as they are clothed with jurisdiction to exercise the judicial power, you can not destroy the inherent power of the court to maintain order in the court room and to punish violation of its lawful orders and decrees." One might as well claim the existence of power growing out of this assumed power of life or death to prohibit all the courts of the United States from granting injunctions, all the courts of the United States from issuing executions, all the courts of the United States from granting the writ of mandamus, because, as I have said, if the power exists the extent to which it shall be exercised is a matter resting entirely in the discretion of the Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. I do, if the Senator only wants to ask me a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all; and I wish to say I do not ask the question in any spirit of antagonism to the Senator's position, but simply because, to use the familiar phrase of my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], "I want some light."

I am aware of the fact that the Senator is discussing a very close question of law, one that has given me a great deal of trouble, and one about which I have had doubts, and I still have some doubt.

I understood the Senator yesterday in his argument to take the position that although Congress had created these courts of inferior jurisdiction it did not have the power to destroy the courts unless at the same time it should substitute in their place courts possessed of similar jurisdiction. I understood the Senator to go further and to contend that one of the reasons, if not the chief reason why this could not be done, was that it would bring about a state of chaos and anarchy, and would be revolution; and that to take away a part of the powers of these statutory courts would pro tanto accomplish the same purpose, in that it would take away the arm of the courts, and to that extent would bring about chaos and revolution.

Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: If Congress should pass an act providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission might set aside or suspend a rate prescribed by a railroad after a full hearing, with the opportunity of all sides to be present with their witnesses and their attorneys, could not Congress provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission having decided that question after full hearing and having set aside the rate established by the carrier, no court shall be permitted to suspend and set aside the rate thus substituted by the Commission without according to all parties the same fullness and the same completeness of hearing upon which the order of the Commission was based?

Is not that practically what is proposed here, and if that is done will that be a deprivation of any power of the court which is essential to its jurisdiction, or will it be a mere regulation of the practice of that court?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I did state yesterday, and I reiterate it to-day, that for the Congress to repeal the laws creating the district and circuit, substituting for them no other inferior courts, would bring about a condition of anarchy, not anarchy in the courts, for they would have been destroyed if it could be lawfully done, but anarchy among the people. It would leave no tribunals in which the guaranties of the Constitution which secure to every citizen life, liberty, and property could be tried by due process of law. It would leave no court in the United States which could try offenders against the laws of the United States.

Think for a moment of 80,000,000 people living under the Constitution without a Federal court from ocean to ocean. That is anarchy; that is revolution. No one could challenge that, and it is because of that inevitable chaos, because of that paralysis of the Government, because of the withdrawal of the judicial tribunals without which in some form, Mr. President, the operations of the Government could not be conducted, that I feel myself warranted in the absence of any authority to deny that the Congress, under the Constitution, can obliterate the judicial system of the United States and substitute nothing in its place. But let that go. I did not argue——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not understand me as disagreeing with him upon that proposition?

Mr. SPOONER. I am glad the Senator agrees with me about it. I did not, however, argue that depriving the courts of the United States of the power to grant a preliminary injunction would bring about anarchy and revolution in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean to convey the idea that the Senator intended it would.

Mr. SPOONER. Even pro tanto, to use the language of the Senator. I am not criticising the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to interrupt the Senator further, if he will permit me. Perhaps he misunderstood me about that.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator perfectly. What I did say about that was that it would emasculate the chancery court. That is what I said, and that is what I say to-day. It would in thousands of cases rob the equity jurisdiction of the power to afford preventive relief, which is inherent in and essential to the jurisdiction in equity.

If in some way a negotiable note had been secured by fraud from the Senator from North Carolina upon misrepresentations which he had good reason to believe were true, involving his whole fortune, and he discovered suddenly that it was a fraud, what good would appeal to equity do the Senator if he could not secure promptly a restraining order to prevent the negotiation of that paper, the passing of it into the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice? The Senator would be left to a remedy at law against a scoundrel who perhaps might be hundreds of miles away, or who might be utterly worthless. He would be irrevocably remediless without the exercise of this power, which ought to inhere in equity and in the chancellor to afford prompt, preventive relief until the case could be heard and the equities determined.

So it is, as I said yesterday, in cases of waste. So it is in cases of threatened trespass, of threatened offenses, even though they be punishable if perpetrated, affecting a man's life, his liberty, his property, if they may not be prevented irrevocable harm would come to the people.

Now, I do not for one moment discuss with the Senator the question either as to the power or the desirability in this case of requiring notice to be given before the issue of a preliminary injunction suspending the order of the Commission. I think in this case it must be accompanied by restraining order pending the hearing of the motion, to make the provision valid if the court finds it necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator insists.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to ask the Senator if his argument did not necessarily lead to the conclusion that Congress could not require the courts to issue notice before the granting of an injunction?

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all. It was provided in the judiciary act that no court in the United States should grant an injunction without reasonable notice. That is a matter for Congress to determine. That is one thing. But the denial to the court of equity of power to issue a preliminary injunction upon terms in proper cases is another thing.

The jurisdiction in equity over the subject-matter existing, the question whether the case is a proper case for preliminary injunction, whether it is a case in which justice and the efficient exercise of the judicial power in equity requires preliminary preventive relief, is a judicial, not a legislative, question. It can not be a political question. The judgment of the legislature can not be substituted for the judgment of the court upon that question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; if my friend will not take much of my time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator if all his arguments, which are perfectly reasonable in the cases he supposes, do not fall to the ground in this case we are discussing? For instance, all the remedies by preliminary injunction which he is pleading for, which I acknowledge, do not apply in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. SPOONER. Do they not?

Mr. TILLMAN. Which would be a body of high men, selected for their eminent fitness, I hope, for the work, who would do nothing without the most careful consideration and investigation, and who, having reached a decision that the rate was too high and declared it to be so, would order a lower and a just rate to go into effect. Does not the Senator see that his plea for the inherent power of the court and the right of the judge to grant protection does not lie in this case?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I proceed now to another phase of this subject, which, so far as my view of it goes, answers the question put to me by the Senator from South Carolina.

In the view I wish now to present I pass from the judicial articles of the Constitution, upon which I have been basing the observations which I have addressed to the Senate, and assume, for the purposes of the argument, that it may be lawful to prohibit generally the granting of interlocutory injunctions by the circuit courts of the United States, and yet be absolutely unlawful to prohibit the granting of such injunctions in cases arising under this bill if enacted into law.

What is the pending bill so far as it affects this question? It is a bill, among other things, to confer upon a commission the power, upon complaint and hearing, to overturn as unreasonable rates fixed by carriers engaged in interstate transportation, and to substitute for the rate or rates thus overturned rates fixed by the Commission as reasonable maximum rates.

Mr. President, I am assuming that the Congress has the power to confer that jurisdiction upon the Commission, making its rates in all courts and places prima facie reasonable rates.

Note that it is not proposed here by this amendment to modify the practice as to injunctions or the judicial power of the courts of equity of the United States in respect of issuing interlocutory injunctions generally. That is to be left as to all other cases to existing law and practice.

Now, Mr. President, that brings me to the Senator's question. There are restrictions in the Constitution upon the exercise by Congress in this particular class of cases, I think, upon the power to restrain courts of equity from issuing interlocutory injunctions. After the adoption of the Constitution, amendments to it were adopted which restrict in many ways the power of Congress as it was conferred by the Constitution itself. Among others is the fifth amendment, which is as follows:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Without that amendment, Mr. President, I should doubt if private property could be taken for public use without just compensation. I do not think it required a constitutional provision to prevent the Congress from enacting a law taking the property of one man and vesting it in another, because that would be violative of fundamental principles which underlie government and which are an essential and vital part of the social compact as we know it.

In a decision of the Supreme Court long ago, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Chase, and being one of great learning, it is declared that, without constitutional restriction, there are acts so abhorrent to natural equity and to every sane man's sense of justice that, although not prohibited by written constitutions, they can not be lawfully done. (See Calder v. Bull., 3 Dallas, 387.)

My friend from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] said the other day in his able speech that he had studied law in my office, which is true, and I felt like saying then what I say now—that he has splendidly redeemed in his maturer years the promises of his youth——

Mr. TILLMAN. He looks to be as old as you.

Mr. SPOONER. But he is not. I have been proud of his career at the bar and I have been proud of his career in the Senate, and it was a gratification to me that the Senator thus publicly alluded to our association of many years ago. He has just called my attention to the fact that in the first case in which an act of a legislature was set aside it was done upon the basis that while it violated no provision of a written constitution it was so abhorrent to common decency and equity that no court could sustain it. There are some things higher than constitutions. They underlie them, they pervade them, Mr. President, and run like golden threads through the warp and woof of the social fabric; and, though unwritten, except in the consciences of men, they are enforced by public opinion and enforced by the courts.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suppose, of course, the Senator means by that when they are not in conflict with a written constitution?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course. I said when they are not in a constitution.

Mr. BACON. When they are not in conflict?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. President, this is a restriction which can not be ignored:

> Nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Mr. President, how does that apply to this case? It is conceded here, I take it, that no rate fixed by a commission to be charged by an interstate carrier for the service which it is compelled to render through the use of its own property, managed by its own servants, and at its own risk, can be enforced without a "day in court" some time and somewhere, upon the question of the justness of the compensation. It is conceded here by everyone that the door of the United States court is open, and can not be closed against an original bill filed by the carrier to set aside the rate fixed by such a commission upon the ground that it does not afford just compensation, that it is confiscatory in its nature, and therefore is a taking of property in violation of the fifth amendment. This bill is to regulate the taking of private property for a public use.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not the presumption to the contrary, however, that this matter having been determined by a high and impartial board or commission who have examined into the facts, and who in their attributes and characteristics are the equals of the judges—is it not the presumption that that tribunal has given justice and has not deprived anybody of property without due compensation? Why not give the man who is shipping the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. SPOONER. Let me answer the question. I answer it yes. I stated that. I said that these rates were made prima facie reasonable. The presumption is that they are reasonable. The burden is upon the carrier to show that they are not reasonable. If they are reasonable, if they afford just compensation for the property taken, the carrier fails in his lawsuit. If they are unreasonable, if they are confiscatory—and I use that word because it is expressive—the carrier must prevail. It is the theory that these rates are presumptively right; but it can not, under the Constitution, Mr. President, be made by Congress the law that they are conclusively right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does not the Senator recognize the justice of the statement of the writers on this subject that a single rate, which alone will be in controversy, can not be confiscatory; that it would take a schedule of rates which could be demonstrated as yielding no proper return to make the basis of such a lawsuit? And that the carrier is allowed to go into court——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Please give me a minute. A carrier is allowed to go into court upon one case or one rate, because the possibility is that a constitutional right has been taken away from him by the Commission, and the judge is to be permitted to issue his order staying the rate and putting the case again into court, causing delay and all that kind of thing.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there is no power in the United States that could take away from the Senator from South Carolina his property. If the carrier takes a rate to the court and can not show it to be unlawful, the suit fails, and that is the end of it. That can only be determined by the court.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why, Mr. President, if I have not $2,000 worth of property involved I can not even get into this court, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator consider that an answer to what I was about to say? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know what it is an answer to; but it is a thought that came into my mind on account of what the Senator did say.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there is no power under the Constitution to take private property for public use, save for just compensation, which is defined to mean "a full and fair equivalent."

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, I beg the Senator to permit me to proceed with my argument.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. And, Mr. President, if the compensation is not just, if it is not determined according to judicial procedure, the Senator will have his remedy.

It will not be contended, I take it, that the property of the public carrier is not as completely within the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution as the property of any individual. It has been sometimes thought otherwise, but without any foundation. It does not follow because property is affected with a public use, that it ceases to be private property entitled to the protection, in its ownership, of the fifth amendment or in proper cases of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The fact that it is charged with a public use, Mr. President, gives to the public the right to regulate it; it gives to the public the right to its use without unjust discrimination for just compensation. It is to secure that right of the public which is inherent as to property affected with a public use, and which can not be taken away, that there comes this right in behalf of the public to regulate the use of such property by its owner and to prevent extortionate charges or unjust discrimination in that use; but subject, Mr. President, to the rights which grow out of the public use with which the property is affected, it is private property as much as any property, and entitled under the Constitution to protection against spoliation as completely as if it were owned by a citizen.

Not long ago the Supreme Court had occasion to deal with that question. I do not know that anyone disputes it. One often hears it suggested that the property used thus by the public, created for public use, is public property, and, because public property, to be absolutely under the domination of the public. That is not the law. It is public in its use; it is private in its ownership, and it is entitled to the protection of the law. I want to read a word from the Supreme Court of the United States on that subject. (W. U. Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 195 U. S.)

> A railroad's right of way has, therefore, the substantiality of the fee—

That is, whether it is acquired by a conveyance in fee or acquired in the exercise of the power of eminent domain—> and it is private property even to the public in all else but an interest and benefit in its uses. It can not be invaded without guilt of trespass. It can not be appropriated in whole or part except upon the payment of compensation. In other words, it is entitled to the protection of the Constitution, and in the precise manner in which protection is given. It can only be taken by the exercise of the powers of eminent domain, and a condition precedent to the exercise of such power is, we said in Sweet v. Rechel, that the statutes conferring it make provision for reasonable compensation to the owner of the property taken.

Now, Mr. President, it must not be supposed that, in order to bring it within the purview of the constitutional amendment, property must in specie be taken. That is not the law. It was decided long ago by the Supreme Court in the "Pumpelly case" (13 Wall., 166) that, though property be not actually taken for public use, if the owner's use of it be destroyed by the Government, it is a taking. In that case public improvements surrounded the land with water so as to prevent its being utilized by the owner, and the Supreme Court held that it was a "taking" of the property within the Constitution which could not be consummated without just compensation.

In Scranton v. Wheeler (179 U. S., 153) the court says:

Undoubtedly compensation must be made or secured to the owner when that which is done is to be regarded as a taking of private property for public use within the meaning of the fifth amendment of the Constitution; and of course, in its exercise of the power to regulate commerce, Congress may not override the provision that just compensation must be made when private property is taken for public use.

* * * * * * *

In Pumpelly v. Green Bay Company (13 Wall., 166, 181) the court construed a provision of the constitution of Wisconsin declaring that the property of no person shall be taken for public use without just compensation therefor, observing that it was a provision almost identical in language with the one relating to the same subject in the Federal Constitution.

Referring to some adjudged cases which went, as the court observed, beyond sound principle, it was said that "It remains true that where real estate is actually invaded by superinduced additions of water, earth, sand, or other material, or by having any artificial structure placed on it, so as to effectually destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, and that this proposition is not in conflict with the weight of judicial authority in this country, and certainly not with sound principle."

How does this differ? Here, Mr. President, the property is not taken, but what is the same thing within the meaning of the law, its use is taken. There is little value in such property save in its use. It is the power to use it for the transportation of passengers and freight and to charge reasonable compensation for that use in which its value consists; and that use can not be taken, Mr. President, under the Constitution of the United States any more without just compensation than the property itself can be taken. Is that disputed?

It is said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S.):

From what has thus been said it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit—

Speaking of the regulation of freight rates—

This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights the State can not require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law.

* * * * * * *

If the company is deprived of the power of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property, and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and in so far as it is thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the company is deprived of the equal protection of the laws. (Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. State of Minn., 134 U. S., 418.)

Mr. President, subject to the one limitation, that the compensation shall be just, the right to fix rates for the carriage of persons and property has many times been held to be within the power of the States. That is the right which, on behalf of the Government, underlies the proposition to pass this bill.

But what about the justness of the compensation? It is irrelevant at least to say that this Commission is, or will be, in point of ability and dignity and all that, the equal of the justices of the Supreme Court. That is apart from the question. It is a matter of principle upon which I am speaking. A suit brought to test the question as to whether the rate is a reasonable rate may be wrongly brought; it may be determined adversely to the carrier; it may be found that the rates afford just compensation within the definition of that expression by the Supreme Court. It may be, however, that this Commission will not be infallible. It is barely possible that it will be composed of human beings with all the likelihood to make mistakes and all the weaknesses of judgment which adhere in mankind. It may be that the rates which they fix would be confiscatory rates. Rates fixed by the States under such legislation have been many times held by the Supreme Court to be confiscatory rates. That is to be judicially determined, and I am speaking of the right to have it so determined one way or the other; and, Mr. President, here comes in a principle, universal in its application, with certain exceptions, laid down by the Supreme Court in extracts which I just read, and nowhere better stated than it is stated by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations. He takes what I first read from Chancellor Kent:

The settled and fundamental doctrine is that government has no right to take private property for public purposes without giving just compensation; and it seems to be necessarily implied that the indemnity should, in cases which will admit of it, be previously and equitably ascertained and be ready for reception concurrently in point of time with the actual exercise of the right of eminent domain.

An exception was made early to that general principle where towns take private property for highways and where counties or municipalities take private property for public uses. Upon this ground the exception was made, and it may be carried beyond this, that the taxable property of the town or of the county or municipality constitutes a fund from which, when ascertained, the owner can, without doubt, secure his just compensation. So the payment at the time of taking in such cases was dispensed with.

And while this is not an inflexible rule unless in terms established by the Constitution, it is so just and reasonable that statutory provisions for taking private property very generally make payment precede or accompany the appropriation and by several of the State constitutions this is expressly required. And on general principles it is essential that an adequate fund be provided from which the owner of the property can certainly obtain compensation; it is not competent to deprive him of his property and turn him over to an action at law against a corporation which may or not prove responsible, and to a judgment of uncertain efficacy. For the consequence would be in some cases that the party might lose his estate without redress, in violation of the inflexible maxim upon which the right is based.

On elementary principles the carrier is entitled to receive for the service rendered in the use of its property at the time the service is rendered the "just compensation" of the fifth amendment. Carriers can not be required to render the service upon credit or to deliver before payment property transported.

One could spend hours, Mr. President, reading decisions to the same purport. How does that apply to this case? In this way: The carrier in the exercise of a constitutional right files his bill in a Federal court—for it is a Federal question regardless of the matter of diverse citizenship—making the Interstate Commerce Commission parties defendant, and the original complainant ought probably to be made a party—alleging that the rate fixed is not "just compensation" within the language of the constitutional amendment, and asking a decree of the court that the Commission be enjoined from enforcing its order.

Mr. OVERMAN rose.

Mr. SPOONER. Excuse me a moment. I will listen to the Senator later. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not mean to offend him.

If an adequate fund or other security were provided from which the carrier could certainly obtain the "just compensation" guaranteed by the fifth amendment when the compensation shall have been judicially ascertained, no such question would arise, for injunction would have no office to perform, none would be granted, and such prohibition would be valueless, and therefore probably innocuous to the bill. No such fund or security could be afforded except by the Government whose Commission fixes the compensation for the use of the property and in whose court the justness of the compensation is being challenged, and that would be "impossible" from every standpoint but that of financial ability.

What happens if without any fund or security, and pending the ascertainment of the just compensation, the court is prohibited from granting an interlocutory injunction, no matter if the bill and exhibits demonstrate its justice and necessity? The complainant carrier will have been compelled to furnish to the public for months, perhaps, the use of its property for the compensation fixed by the Commission and challenged in court from the beginning as noncompensatory. If the rate shall be held by the court in the end to be not "just compensation," and the enforcement of the order be perpetually enjoined as unlawful, how stands the carrier? The difference between the rate fixed by the Commission and "just compensation" may amount to many millions. It will have compulsorily rendered the service by the use of its property for the public without the "just compensation," to which the Constitution entitles and of which no valid law can deprive it. So far as it relates to the difference between the rates collected and just compensation, it will have been compelled to furnish the use of its property, through its own servants and at its own cost and risk upon credit. Where is its remedy? From "an adequate fund from which the owner of the property can certainly obtain compensation," as in the case of the individual? There is none such. There is no remedy. Its only recourse would be to bring many suits as there were separate shippers, for large sums and small sums, against the solvent and the insolvent, against estates of shippers who meanwhile have died, against parties in different jurisdictions—perhaps in other countries—certainly in different sections of our own country, involving a multiplicity of suits beyond comprehension very barren of result. It would all come to this: That private property would have been taken for public use without just compensation paid in hand and without possibility of redress, for there would obviously be no redress. Can this be done under the Constitution? Can Congress provide for the compulsory taking of this property, and at the same time by law applicable only to this class of cases prohibit the courts of the United States having jurisdiction of the subject-matter from exercising the judicial power to secure the full protection which the fifth amendment, upon the demand of the States, was adopted to afford? It would not be a regulation of the jurisdiction, but a limitation of the judicial power. It would be substituting for the discretion of the chancellor the judgment of the legislature. It would be, in effect, making the rate fixed by the Commission conclusive pending final decree.

It will not be contended that Congress may lawfully provide that the rate shall be conclusive until final decree setting the order aside, and that the decree shall not relate back to the filing of the bill. In effect this would accomplish substantially the same result.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. No; not now. Excuse me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. Will not any Senator say that at least this is a serious and dangerous question whether that is constitutional or not?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will not let me interrupt him. I tried to get in.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator's observations would not illuminate what I have in my mind.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I would illuminate the subject all the same.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, I do not mean to be discourteous or to minimize in the least the Senator's ability. He knows I do not. But I wish at this moment not to be interrupted by anyone.

There are in this bill, Mr. President, questions which can not be eliminated from it. The Supreme Court has left it an open question whether Congress has the power under the commerce clause to fix maximum rates or the prices which the carrier shall charge for interstate transportation. They said so in the Northern Securities case. Great lawyers differ about the power. It is not absolutely clear, but I think the power will be sustained. I know this, Mr. President, that it is time the Supreme Court passed upon that question, and it can not pass upon it until the Congress enacts legislation which involves it. Let that go. We can not eliminate that danger, if it be a danger. It is doubted by very able lawyers whether if Congress possesses the power to fix maximum rates, it possesses the power to delegate the function to the Commission which is provided for by this bill. That can not be eliminated because of anybody's doubt. Otherwise that question could not be presented to the Supreme Court.

But this danger is not necessary. The court may, without injustice to shipper or carrier, grant in proper cases, as is done in other cases, interlocutory injunctions upon terms. This course will, as nearly as possible, be just to all interests. The terms may be either a bond running to the Interstate Commerce Commission or otherwise, as may be thought wise, and conditioned to repay to shippers, if the order be sustained, the charges collected pending final decree in excess of those fixed by the order of the Commission. Or—and much I prefer this—the excess rates may be required to be paid into court monthly to abide the result of the litigation, for distribution among those entitled if the order is sustained. The payment of the excess is, in my opinion, practicable, and it would have a greater tendency to prevent litigation except upon good ground for it. I have thought much of this phase of the subject, but can not now discuss it. Either plan can be arranged to do approximate justice both to shippers and carriers without endangering the validity of any portion of the act.

All these fears about the eternity of such litigation are without foundation. That is largely a matter within the power of Congress. It largely is due to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], while Attorney-General, that measures have been placed upon the statute books for speeding such causes. These cases need not go to the court of appeals. They ought not to go there. They may go directly to the Supreme Court, and all the legislative power may be exercised, consistent with the validity of the procedure, to bring about speedy hearings and determination of the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let me ask him a question with respect to this bond scheme? What provision would he make to see to it that the man who actually paid the freight, and not the man who nominally paid it, got the excess returned to him?

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is practicable. The Senator knows what my judgment about that is. It requires special provision to accomplish that. I think if it provided simply for the return to the "shipper" of the excess rates, in thousands of cases the man who really paid the excess would not get it. But I can not enter upon that at this time.

No man knows any better than I the good faith with which this proviso is offered. No man appreciates any more than I do the great ability with which it has been advocated by the Senator from Texas. I can not agree with him. It is an honest difference of opinion. It has always been my theory to avoid dangers in legislation, where it can be done, and I can see no possible justification for incorporating in the bill unnecessarily a provision which may afford good ground for the successful challenge of its validity.

Mr. President, I have finished. The question I have discussed is, in its relation to this measure and independent of it entirely, of the gravest possible import. Painfully conscious of the discursiveness and inadequacy of my presentation of it, I thank the Senate for the courtesy of its patient attention.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator does not think, if that feature of the bill was declared unconstitutional, it would affect the remainder of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I fear it would affect that part of the bill which authorizes the Commission to fix rates.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have no desire to trespass upon the Senate and I would not say anything at this time if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] had not forgotten his usual courtesy and refused to allow me to interrogate him or to make some side remarks as he went along. It is the first time he has ever done so, and, of course, he must reconcile it to himself why he did it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will permit me. I would not be willing that the Senator should attribute it to anything else than the fact that I was speaking in a very great stress because of illness and have been anxious to conclude.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator puts it on that ground, of course I will have to pardon him, but he is an old sinner in that regard.

Mr. President, I want to say only one or two things. The Senator from Wisconsin has spoken with great ingenuity and force and eloquence in condemnation of a remark which was let drop accidentally, sub rosa, yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] in regard to the power of Congress to destroy the courts, as though anyone anywhere had ever dreamed of any such desire or purpose lurking in anybody's mind. It was merely brought out by that Senator for the purpose of illustrating the contention of some of us that whatever we can create and whatever we can destroy we can control.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield, certainly. I will not emulate the example of my friend in that respect.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not made a speech for three years wherein half of the time was not surrendered to the Senator from South Carolina, who upbraids me to-day for refusing to yield under the conditions I have stated.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to speak in any sense as showing any ill will or anger, because I feel none; but I am merely trying to pick up some loose threads which the Senator left hanging around as he went along.

As I said, he has made a great deal of the point, if it be a point, that the Senator from Maryland let drop yesterday that we could destroy the courts, which, as I said, was for the sole purpose of enforcing the contention that if we can create and if we can destroy, we can control; and that would upturn or overthrow the Senator's contention that in this particular case we could not limit the power of the circuit court in that matter without destroying the constitutionality of the act, if it becomes one.

He has convinced himself, and undoubtedly he has convinced many others here, that that is good law. Possibly it is. It is the nature of all human beings to seek to aggrandize any power they have, and the judiciary of the United States have not been wanting in the effort to extend their jurisdiction and usurp jurisdiction in many cases where they had no right to go, and to assert authority and to do things that were tyrannical and outrageous; and these things have brought about the condition which is now broadcast in the country, where the people distrust the Federal judges. It is a great pity it is so, but I am merely stating the fact; and they are responsible for that distrust which exists because of the arbitrary and tyrannical way in which they have exercised their power.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] illustrated this a few days ago by stating how a judge in Florida has granted an injunction against everything and everybody down there, including the State government, I believe—anyhow the officers of the State government—bringing suit to test the question whether there was a legal case, which ought to be tested before its order was issued.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike by my silence to appear to acquiesce in the statement of the Senator from South Carolina that at least so far as concerns the section of country where I reside the people distrust the Federal courts. Just the opposite, according to observation and according to my belief, is the truth. The people have always had the greatest confidence in those courts and the most entire respect for them, and I do not believe they have ever had for those courts greater respect or more confidence than they have at the present time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only expressing my own opinions and what I know exists in my part of the world. I have the impression that probably we have a class of judges, some of whom have come down to us from the past periods of unrest and disturbed conditions—conditions which made it unfortunate for our country that we had to have some men appointed—who have not entirely conformed to the ideas we possess of justice and good behavior on the bench.

But I am merely expressing the belief that the reason why the people are unwilling to have the order of the Commission subject to the arbitrary will of the Federal judiciary, or at least of these minor courts, is that they do not feel they can any longer trust them. I may be in error, but that is my judgment.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether or not he is reflecting upon Judge Goff, United States judge in his district, a citizen of my State, and one whom we know to be above suspicion?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not reflecting upon any individual, but I do know that some of the judges from the Potomac southward and westward have not been very careful or very decent in their exercise of judicial authority. I could hunt up instances, and if the Senator wants me to I will furnish him a catalogue of them.

Mr. SCOTT. I am waiting for the Senator to give me anything that would in any way reflect upon the character of Judge Goff, of my State, if he has any such evidence.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not said a word about Judge Goff.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator, in reflecting upon the judges of the courts, necessarily takes Judge Goff into consideration, and I resent the imputation that Judge Goff is not an honorable, true, upright judge.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator had better wait until I attack Judge Goff before he defends him.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator attacked the courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have said what I believe to be true, and the Senator may make the most of it. I do not believe that the people of this country have that faith in the justice and fairness of the Federal judiciary which they ought to have and which they would have under different circumstances, or there would be no need for any such legislation in regard to the exercise of power as we propose, some of us, to try to get into this bill. That is all there is about it.

I merely made use of this observation to justify the efforts we are making to prevent a repetition of the programme that has disgraced Pennsylvania, where the oil producers at Titusville seventeen years ago, having had a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission and got a judgment in their favor against a rate, have been buffeted about from pillar to post for seventeen years, trying to get damages and have not succeeded. That is the reason why this condition of unrest and distrust exists.

Mr. SCOTT. We like to hear the Senator repeat that, as he has done for several days. It is very interesting to hear that same case repeated.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, one good case, if it be true, is worth a thousand.

Mr. SCOTT. We like to hear it every day.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. I think I will have it printed every morning, something along the line of that famous saying of Cato the Elder, who never made a speech in Rome or anywhere else or on any occasion but that he always wound it up with that famous phrase, "Delenda est Carthago"—"Carthage must be destroyed, fellow-citizens." And if the Senator wants me to, I will try sometime during every day, when this debate is on, to allude to the fact that certain citizens of the United States, whose property was stolen from them by the railroads by unjust rates, so declared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, have been endeavoring for seventeen years to get back their property under the Constitution and can not do it.

There are many instances, I will inform the Senator from West Virginia, in which not the judges, but the roads which we are endeavoring to control, have been guilty of more arbitrary and outrageous things than that. I will, before I get through, furnish a catalogue of his home affairs, if the Senator does not know anything about them.

Mr. SCOTT. I presume the Senator refers to the letter from Governor Dawson.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no; I have about forty letters from all sorts of coal miners and coke producers and every other kind of citizens in West Virginia, showing the iniquities and outrages to which they have been subjected.

The governor of West Virginia did me the honor of sending me a letter. I suppose the Senator feels aggrieved because he did not send it to him. I did not ask him to send it. I merely discharged my duty in giving it to the people of the country as an illustration of a condition which is outrageous and which we are seeking to remedy here by legislation.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I presume, as the Senator is so much interested in my State and in the coal operators, coke operators, etc., he will support the amendment I offered to this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have forgotten what it was. I hope the Senator will give us a speech telling us why he introduced it, and then we will all know enough about it probably to vote intelligently. There are so many amendments pouring in here from all directions that I have not even time to read them. I am trying to read up on the general subject, and to keep posted as I go along as best I may.

Mr. President, I did not expect to get into any unpleasant controversy like this when I stated, as a general proposition, the reason why the passage of this bill is of such vast importance. It is because the people have lost faith in the judges. Now, I repeat it. I believe it. That is all there is about it. I may be wrong; I hope I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. I guess you are.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know I am not wrong about my own part of the country. I illustrated that in the case of Judge Pardee, and I know of many other instances of similar arbitrary and outrageous action on the part of the judiciary down there.

The Senator from Wisconsin has reasoned and argued and pleaded with great force and eloquence about the right of railroads not to have their property confiscated by an unjust rate which has been lowered by the Commission after a full hearing. He ridiculed me a little yesterday about being a cornfield lawyer. I have adopted that title myself. I do not feel at all discredited by it.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. TILLMAN. I say it is my own phrase.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator gave me that himself.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes. The Senator ridiculed it, however, in his sarcastic way. He said he did not want any advice from a cornfield lawyer, and that was as much as to say: "You are a nincompoop; just sit down and wait until I get through." [Laughter.] As I was saying, the Senator has pleaded with us and argued very strongly and eloquently to prevent the great outrage that would come to a railroad whose property would be taken without just compensation by the decree of the Commission which would lower a given rate, and he has argued that we must give the judges the right to issue an injunction and prohibit such a rate from going into effect while they take the case up and try it over.

There are other cornfield lawyers besides myself, and in my mail yesterday I received a letter which I will read. I want the Senator to follow it with attention.

NORMAN, OKLA., March 19, 1906.

Senator TILLMAN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please pardon me for calling your attention to one or two points relative to the paramount questions of the day—the regulation of freight rates and the tariff, the daddy of the trusts.

If the railroads can enjoin—

Now, this is a legal point of this cornfield lawyer or cotton-patch lawyer—

If the railroads can enjoin the lowering of a freight rate, can not the railway commission or any interested party enjoin the raising of rates by the roads?

That is a nice legal point, but it involves that old-time Anglo-Saxon doctrine of what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. The Senator from Wisconsin is arguing for the gander. I represent the goose in this controversy. I say it not as a witticism, but as an illustration of the fact. The Senator and those who agree with him plead for the railroads. I plead for those who produce these billions of American wealth.

They regard these laborers as geese, who do not do any thinking; and that is certainly true on election day.

Mr. SPOONER. Did the Senator say that I characterized him as a goose?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I am afraid the Senator has a rather contemptuous idea of the intelligence and capacity of cornfield lawyers.

Mr. SPOONER. I only want to say this——

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, I am not going to charge the Senator with any undue disrespect or feeling of contempt for the average common man of the country. I do not think he is that way.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to be permitted to say——

Mr. TILLMAN. If I would treat the Senator like he treated me, I would say, "No, you had better wait until I get through." But go ahead.

Mr. SPOONER. I am treating the Senator, with his permission, as he has always treated me, and he has been welcome, too.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, I forgive the Senator for his little—well, departure from his time-honored method of his allowing me to help his speeches out, and he thought he would get one dull speech out without there being any TILLMAN in it.

Mr. SPOONER. He thought he would make a good speech to-day if he could make himself heard.

Mr. TILLMAN. By helping me in making speeches, you mean?

Mr. SPOONER. I have a great deal of respect for the Senator and his ability, and I have a great deal of respect for cornfield lawyers. There are very strong, able men among them. But I am going to say, and I hope the Senator will not regard it as any reflection upon his part of the legal profession, that if I had a constitutional question to be presented to the court I do not think I would hire a cornfield lawyer to do it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course we would get thrown out on the practice. We might knock you fellows out on the principle, but then we would go to flinders on the practice. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. I would hire a man who could get into court.

Mr. TILLMAN. This man is in court. Here is the question:

> If the railroads can enjoin the lowering of a freight rate, can not the railway commission or any interested party enjoin the raising of rates by the roads? Again, if a low rate can be confiscatory to the railroads, why can not a high rate be confiscatory to freighted stuff? If cotton cost 7 cents to grow, pick, and gin it, and the freight is 1½ cents to market it, and it only sells for 8 cents, is not this confiscatory? And will not the same conditions apply to a high or low rate equally, on corn, wheat, and so forth? If the Congressional railroad attorneys answer—

Now, these are his words, not mine:

> answer, "But your farm products cost too much." Then can not we people answer with equal legal right and truthfulness that your roads cost too much?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to apply that phrase to me?

Mr. TILLMAN. I expressly said "No;" that these are this man's words. I do not say that there are any railroad attorneys in the Senate. I hope to God there are none here. But it shows what this man thinks, and there are many millions of fellows back in the backwoods who are thinking and scratching their heads over the question as to what we are going to do to relieve them.

> Right here let me ask who paid for the building of these roads, now estimated at $13,000,000,000? According to my understanding, they were built on paper—that is, by floating stocks and bonds—and these are gradually redeemed through freight earnings. Then, every dollar paid to redeem the cost of this mushroom $13,000,000,000 has been through confiscation of property; and yet the roads cry "Confiscation!" Let me ask you: If it is unconstitutional to correct our present railroad law, then, since we had no railroads when our Constitution was made, what about that law?

There is more of this farmer's cold-blooded logic, but I will only quote his last sentence—

> We, the people, have been taught that we were the Atlas upon whose shoulders the Government rested, and that we had created our Congress to make laws to protect us in life and property, but it now seems that Congress has lost to us this heritage and that our railroads and other trusts are the Government.
> Please pardon me for this letter, but I am bursting just here to halloo.
> Yours, respectfully, T. J. JOHNSON.

This man has made his plea. I sincerely trust his cry may be heeded.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin has got the point of this letter, which is this, that under this bill, if it becomes a law, every railroad will be required to fix a tariff on all things to be shipped and publish it, and that under law, except by the order of the Commission, no change can be made in that published tariff under thirty days. This man proposes that we shall incorporate in this law a provision to permit the Commission to ask an injunction to prevent a raise of rates, and I have taken the trouble, since getting this letter from my cornfield friend of the legal profession, to see how it would look on paper. So I have drafted an amendment which would incorporate this idea, and I should like the Senator's legal opinion, as well as his judgment, of the justice and good sense of the policy:

> Whenever any complaint is made against any carrier or carriers in accordance with section 15 as amended by this act concerning rates or charges which have been established and published by the carrier or carriers and which raise the rates then existing so as to provide greater compensation for transportation than the rates or charges which may at the time be enforced, but which rates so raised have not at the time of the filing of the complaint gone into effect, it shall be the duty of the Commission upon motion of the complainant to make an order forbidding the carrier or carriers to put in force the rates so raised and requiring the carrier or carriers to continue to charge and collect no more than the existing rates during the pendency of such complaint before the Commission.

Now, the Senator has labored here very eloquently, as I said, to show the great outrage and wrong that would come to the railroads if an order of the Commission is not allowed to be suspended by the court. This man asks us to incorporate a provision like that I have read in this bill; in other words, that if the court shall be permitted to enjoin the lowering of this rate, we shall give the producers, the shippers, the same right to go to the Commission and ask it to forbid the raising of any rate that is already in existence; and I presume, of course, the right to suspend the proposed higher rate of the railroads would be permitted by the court if we could get an injunction against the railroad. I would like the Senator's opinion on it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is not addressing himself to me, but is interesting all Senators, and if he does not object I will interrupt him to say that as I understand it, so far as the general principle is concerned, the provision for review by the court that he suggests is exactly what is desired for this bill—a provision in the bill, put there by amendment, that will be for the benefit of the shippers as well as for the benefit of the carriers. The bill as it now stands allows practically no appeal to the courts for either.

Mr. TILLMAN. But, Mr. President, the Senator does not address himself to the point which I presented, and that is this: If it is proper to provide in this bill that the order of the Commission shall not go into effect—if a judge sees proper to enjoin it—why will it not be proper to place in the bill a provision which will forbid the railroads from raising any rate pendente lite?

Mr. FORAKER. There is no objection to that. I have not heard of anybody objecting to it. On the contrary, that is precisely what is proposed by those who are favoring a broader court review.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the question of raising the rate by the railroad has never been discussed. It is not provided for.

Mr. FORAKER. Over and over again in the Committee on Interstate Commerce and here in the Senate over and over again that identical point has been urged. I have heard it; I can not recall just what particular Senators made that appeal; but the Senator from West Virginia did, I know; the Senator himself reminds me of it; he made a special point that the courts ought to be open to the shipper and to the carrier alike.

Mr. TILLMAN. Open to both to review or to appeal from the decision of the Commission; not open to both to have the Commission protect the shipper against the railroad raising its own rate.

Mr. FORAKER. Why, Mr. President, the moment either the carrier or the shipper gets into the court he is there, whether it be the carrier or the shipper, to receive justice according to the judgment of the court, whether it be in a permanent injunction or a temporary restraining order.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator will not touch the point I am coming to, and it is this—if I can make myself understood—that when a railroad has published its rate and which, probably for good reasons, it is desirous to raise those rates it does not have to ask anybody's opinion or consent now. If we are going to permit a court to enjoin the order of the Commission so as to prevent redress to the shipper in the effort to get rates lowered, then the shipper should have the right to get an injunction against the railroads from raising the rate, if they propose to do it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, there is no trouble about that. I think if the railroad undertakes to raise a rate to a point that is extortionate, or that is unreasonable or unjust, or to make a rate that is discriminatory, the court is now open to the shipper to appeal to it; and the court will, if necessary to avoid a multiplicity of suits, grant the shipper immediate relief upon an application for a restraining order and the presentation of the case that entitles him to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did the Senator ever hear of any court granting an injunction in that kind of a case? Has he ever heard of such a case being brought?

Mr. FORAKER. Under the Elkins law, which I hope, as the result of all this discussion, to see amended as the legislation we shall enact. That is exactly what was done, in different form, in the Chesapeake and Ohio and New Haven coal case. The court immediately on the filing of the bill granted a temporary restraining order, which stood until the case passed up to the circuit court of appeals and the Supreme Court, where that temporary restraining order was made final. So in the court, in fifteen minutes after the suit was brought, the relief was granted that was finally made perpetual and which continued until it was made perpetual.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not very familiar with that case. The little I know about it is that one railroad sued another railroad and there was some dispute about the amount of freight; and the result was that the Supreme Court declared that there was an illegal and unlawful transaction, which they overthrew.

Mr. FORAKER. What the court decided was that the Chesapeake and Ohio was granting rebates. But, Mr. President, while the facts there differed from the case suggested by the Senator, the principle is precisely the same. He seldom will get two cases exactly alike in fact.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. I was only going to observe, and I think the Senator from Ohio has in his last remarks anticipated me, that the question of the Senator from South Carolina was met in referring to that particular case. I know something of that case, because it was instituted while I was Attorney-General. The charge there was not that the rate was too high to the shipper, but that through a contract for the sale of coal they had worked out a system of rebates and discriminations; and that is what the court enjoined in that particular case.

Mr. FORAKER. But the Senator will remember I said that what might be done in that character of case might also be done in the other. We are talking about the right of parties who have grievances to appeal to the courts for relief, and not about a particular case. The principle that is invoked in all such cases is the same.

Mr. KNOX. If I may interrupt the Senator further——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I would have grave doubts about the circuit court of the United States entertaining jurisdiction upon an appeal of a shipper against a railroad company to prevent it from raising its rates. I would have very grave doubts about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have such doubt about it that unless it is incorporated in some law I never expect to see it come about.

Mr. FORAKER. In my opinion the shipper can now interpose to enjoin an extortionate rate if without adequate remedy at law. I think I could satisfy the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is no longer an open question, if it ever was one, that in the courts, upon the appeal of any aggrieved party and to avoid a multiplicity of suits, an extortionate rate will be enjoined or a discriminatory rate will be enjoined. I cited some authorities to that effect when I addressed the Senate some days ago.

Mr. TILLMAN. But what about this particular point?

Mr. FORAKER. But referring to the question of the Senator from South Carolina, there is no objection that I know of to putting in here a provision which would embody that principle and give effect to it if it be properly framed.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I doubt whether the Senator from Ohio is exactly correct in view of the effect of the Elkins law. We provided there that an injunction might lie where the complaint was not that the rate was too high per se, but too high in that it was discriminatory, and the Supreme Court did sustain that clause of the law. It has always been my judgment that independent of this rate bill as to the enlarged power of the court in that respect we ought to apply it as an amendment to that law. Then an injunction would lie either whether the rate was claimed to be too high in itself or, as now, where it is too high in that it is discriminatory.

Mr. TILLMAN. The point I have tried to make seems to be shied around or run over or hit out at by every lawyer who tackles it except my friend from Pennsylvania, and that is, whether or not it is now possible—and if not, why we should not make it possible—that a railroad that proposes to raise its published rates under this bill, if we make it a law, shall not be enjoined by the Commission from doing so by a judge upon a complaint made to the Commission by the parties interested.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will do me the honor to read the amendment to this bill which I have proposed he will find that I have made the provision for that exact relief. That is to say, I have undertaken to so amend the third section of the Elkins law as to provide that whenever any shipper makes a complaint, no matter in how informal a way, to the Interstate Commerce Commission it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission at once to notify the railroad, and if it will not desist, then so far to investigate as to determine whether or not there be probable cause, and if so, to immediately send it to the proper court, where the court shall proceed forthwith to hear and determine whether or not the charge, if it be that an excessive rate is being collected, is unreasonable or unjust, and if so, to enjoin it.

Now, how could anything be more expeditious than that? Not only that, but I want the Senator to do me the favor to look carefully at that amendment, because this correspondent of his has directed his attention to a crucial point in this whole matter. I want to call his attention to the fact, and I want him to notice it when he reads that amendment, that it is here provided that in the court where that relief is sought the proceedings shall be not at the expense of the shipper, but in the name of the Government, and without any expense whatever to the shipper. If the railroad be found in fault, it shall pay all the expense. Otherwise the expense is borne by the public, as it should be, because the prosecution will be not for that complainant alone, but for all the members of the class to which he belongs.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Ohio will recall the fact that when he read his proposed law, which was a bill to be enacted into law in place of this one, and discussed it so luminously, as he always does, by common consent almost everybody on the committee who was there agreed that it was admirable if we would just put into it a provision that the Commission should have the power to fix rates and grant relief, as we propose to do in the Hepburn bill and as I proposed to do in that little bill of mine which is so peacefully sleeping upstairs. But the Senator's programme, as outlined in his bill, is to have no commission do anything toward relieving the people, but to confine the relief to the courts entirely, and have them determine once for all whether there is any grievance or wrong to be righted. Therefore his bill was never seriously considered by anybody but himself. It has some very admirable features in it, however.

Mr. FORAKER. Whether it was seriously considered by anybody else or not, I hope the Senator will allow me to urge it upon his attention.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think the Senator had better urge it upon the attention of the Senate than upon my attention, because I have but one vote here, and that is my own. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to unduly urge it upon the Senator, but I shall urge it upon the Senate. I want to say to the Senator, with all due respect for his judgment in the matter, that I do not undertake to say that the courts shall make rates, but I undertake to say that the proceeding before the courts is more expeditious than the proceeding before a commission can possibly be to work out the remedies that the Senator seeks to secure by this legislation that he is advocating. I do not, however, wish at this late hour to interrupt the Senator if he does not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to give way to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who is here and has been patiently waiting for some time, because of an engagement he has, to make a speech on the fortifications appropriation bill, and with an apology to the Senate for having trespassed thus much on its time, I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily in order that the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] may ask for the resumption of the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say that I was not aware that the Senator from Virginia was waiting to make a speech, or I should not have interrupted the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14171, being the fortifications appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to state that all the amendments to the bill proposed by the Committee on Appropriations have been considered and passed upon by the Senate, excepting the one on page 7, after line 7, to insert the provision for the erection of a powder plant. I ask that that amendment may now be read, as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] wishes to speak to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to by the Senator from California will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Appropriations reported an amendment, on page 7, after line 7, to insert:

POWDER FACTORY.

For the erection and equipment of a powder factory, with its necessary communications and accessory structures, upon such reservation now or that may hereafter be under the control of the War Department as may be selected by the Secretary of War, $125,000.

Mr. DANIEL. At this late hour, Mr. President, I should not ask the attention of the Senate but that I am compelled to leave the city to-night by an engagement of a kind that is bound to be respected. I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible consistently with the facts in stating the considerations which underlie this amendment and make its adoption expedient and necessary.

It will be observed that this amendment proposes to appropriate $125,000 for the establishment of a powder factory with its accessories. It is estimated by General Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance, that this factory will cost $100,000, and that the extra $25,000 will provide for incidental expenses and those accessories which will be indispensable thereto. It is estimated by an expert who testified before the committee that this powder factory when established can produce 5,000 pounds of smokeless powder per day.

THE NECESSITY FOR THE POWDER FACTORY—THE GIGANTIC POWDER TRUST.

The necessity of the amendment for the erection of this powder factory arises from a condition of facts of which Congress has but recently been apprised, not through public officials, but by a public-spirited citizen. On the 22d of February last Mr. Robert S. Waddell, who is himself the president of the Buckeye Black Powder Factory, at Peoria, Ill., wrote a public letter, which was widely circulated. Inquiry about that gentleman shows that he is a business man and a citizen of high standing. He has had long experience in the manufacture of powder, and was for twenty years or more connected with the Du Pont Powder Company. His presence before the committee indicated that he was a gentleman of dignity and intelligence, and it was obvious that he was one possessed of great information and of accuracy of statement. This public letter of Mr. Waddell I asked leave some two weeks or more ago to have inserted in the RECORD, because it seemed to me that the information which he imparted was of a character which should be publicly considered.

Without attempting to follow his exact words, it will be found, on a perusal of that letter that it contained six or seven, if not more, principal statements and charges with respect to this subject-matter. The first is that a gigantic trust has an absolute and exclusive monopoly for the manufacture of all the powder that the Government requires for offensive and defensive uses. That trust is the International Company, and it has embraced and swallowed up the Laflin & Rand Powder Company, of Wilmington, Del.; the California Powder Company, and all the powder companies in this country which are engaged in this manufacture. These powder companies are situated, two of them in California (one at Pinole, in Contra Costa County, and one at Santa Cruz), two in New Jersey (one at Haskell and one at Parlin), and one in Wilmington, Del.

SEPARATE AND SIMILAR BIDS BY CORPORATE MEMBERS OF THE TRUST.

It seems that in the course of the practice—and he so charges—that they all bid separately the same price for ordnance smokeless powder to be sold to the Government. That price is 70 cents per pound, the United States furnishing the alcohol, which costs, approximately, 5 cents a pound, so that the powder costs us about 75 to 80 cents per pound. All of the powder which we now use and all the markets for powder in this country to which we may go are controlled by this powder trust, and, under the inspection of Army and Navy officers stationed at the different plants, the trust manufactures this powder which it sells to the Government without a single competitor!

DIFFICULTIES OF COMPETITION—PATENTS CONTROLLED BY THE TRUST.

It will be asked, to begin with, why may not independent manufacturers compete with this trust? The trust has bought up all the patents on the subject, including the particular patents of Bernadou and Converse, officers of the Navy of the United States, and has specific and complete control both of the ideas which are used in the manufacture of this powder and of the actual manufacture of the product.

The writer states that for a number of years—and his statement is verified by the records of our Navy Department—this powder pool, or trust, for a long time charged this Government from 88 to 90 cents per pound; that when the International plant was built competition was reduced to the present basis, and that then the Du Pont trust obtained control of the International product.

The capacity of the several plants is stated as follows:

Name of plant.	Daily.	Yearly.
	Pounds.	Pounds.
Du Pont	7,000	2,100,000
Laflin & Rand	7,000	2,100,000
International	6,000	1,800,000
California	4,000	1,200,000

The three eastern seaboard plants are in almost constant operation.

EXPERIENCE OF THE KING POWDER COMPANY.

An important fact, also stated by this authority—and it is abundantly sustained, as it seems, by the testimony—is that the United States can build and equip, as Mr. Waddell says, four better plants than this trust owns at a cost of not exceeding $250,000 each, pay for these plants from the profits extorted from the people in a single year, and have more than a million dollars left in the Treasury that would, under present conditions, be paid to further enrich the trust.

The Army and the Navy can detail scores of men, graduates of the academies, who are more competent to direct the making of powder than those who now supply it.

Not only, Mr. President, does the existence of these patents stand in the way of the competition of American manufacturers who might desire to compete, but there is stated by Mr. Waddell, in a paper which I have before me, what I think I should read to the Senate. I shall not take part in using terms of accusation against anybody, but information of this kind, coming from a respectable source, ought to be publicly communicated, and if there be answer to it this forum is as open for the answer as it is for the suggestion. Mr. Waddell says:

Business men laugh when it is suggested that possibly Congress might open a way so that this powder could be made in competition with the "trust," and they recite the experience of the King Powder Company, of Cincinnati. It submitted samples and competed for Government business when black powder was furnished the Army and Navy. The tests all showed the King powder inferior, and the analysis and proof of tests were furnished. That company, satisfied that their product was as good or better than the Du Pont, the King company bought a quantity of Du Pont powder from a lot furnished the Government, packed it in King kegs, and submitted it. This Du Pont powder under King labels was tested and proved very much inferior to the King powder. Then the "King" went into the "trust." I was on the other side and chuckled over the results.

SEVENTY TO EIGHTY CENTS A POUND FOR POWDER.

Mr. President, the Government is now paying, and has for a long time been paying—for a period of nearly ten years—70 cents or more per pound for this powder.

Under interrogations by members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, General Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance, produced a table, which will be found in the printed hearings before that committee, which shows the quantities of powder furnished at 70 cents a pound. I will ask that the table be printed in the RECORD without reading all of its separate items. It shows, in summary, that between the 26th day of June, 1898, and January 26, 1906, the number of pounds purchased at 70 cents per pound was 3,317,288. The quantity purchased at 80 cents a pound was 1,367,088 pounds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the table referred to by the Senator from Virginia will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to give the Senator some additional information which was not before our committee at the time the hearings were had.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. PERKINS. It is as to the amount of powder purchased by the Navy Department at the same prices which the Senator has given. For the year ending June 30, 1905, we purchased from the powder companies 3,716,909 pounds of smokeless powder.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad, indeed, to have the statement of the Senator, and to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. PERKINS. And we manufactured during the same year at Indianhead 581,729 pounds, making, I will say to the Senator, 4,298,638 pounds that were manufactured and purchased for the Navy Department in addition to the quantity which the Senator has stated. I should not have interrupted the Senator but for the fact I thought it might be well to give the information.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad to have that addition to the information on this subject. It is one with which most of us and the public generally are but little acquainted.

WHAT IS SMOKELESS POWDER?—ITS RAW MATERIALS AND COST.

What is this smokeless powder? What ought to be its cost? What quantity are we under obligation to obtain, and how is it best to get it? The raw materials of the smokeless powder consist, first, of cotton fabric. This cotton fabric is worth, at an extreme price, about 10 cents per pound. The quotations on the market recently are 10 cents, running down to 3 cents for the poorer grades. Putting it at the maximum price, we will say 10 cents per pound. The next ingredient is a solution of nitric and sulphuric acids, in which this cotton fabric is soaked and dissolved. The estimate of the cost of the quantity of these chemicals per pound of powder is 6 cents. The next ingredients are ether and alcohol. The quantity which goes into a pound of powder is worth about 4 cents. So that, in the rough, the materials which compose 1 pound of smokeless powder, used in this manner, come to about 20 or 22 cents per pound.

How much does the finished product cost? According to an estimate made by Mr. Waddell, who gave his figures apparently from close calculation and who made the impression upon the committee that he was a business man familiar with details and very accurate in his statements, this powder can be produced at about 35 cents per pound—about half of what we are now paying for it.

ESTIMATED COST AT INDIAN HEAD EXCESSIVE.

There were two witnesses before our committee, both of them gentlemen of great intelligence. One of them—and he was very familiar with this subject—was the Chief of Ordnance, General Crozier. According to his statements, at Indian Head, which is about 22 miles from here on the Maryland side down the Potomac River, the estimate of cost of a pound of smokeless powder is 60 or 61 cents. It was shown, as I think—and the committee seem to have shared my impression—that this estimate was in some respects an exaggerated one in calculation. The plant is not a very large one; it has not been worked to its capacity, and elements of cost enter into the calculation at a figure which ought to be reduced in any well-ordered factory and by a more careful estimate. For instance, the land on which this Indian Head Government factory is located cost some $62,000. The estimate of yearly deterioration, made from some general rule of business, is 10 per cent, and insurance is estimated at 6 per cent. Both of these items are too large. Mr. Waddell very properly and justly pointed out that such a calculation for deterioration was impossible, for the land stays there and will always be worth something like or at least a great part of its original value. It will not evaporate or vanish in ten years and may increase in value. He stated also that smokeless powder was less liable to explode and less destructive in its character than the black powder which he manufactured and that insurance to him in the manufacture of black powder was 2 per cent, and not 6, as had been calculated in the estimate of cost in the Government factory at Indian Head.

Other details of estimate I need not go into or report upon. Suffice it to say that it is considered by the committee, and on testimony which it regards as reliable, that the Government can make considerable saving by establishing the factory for which the amendment provides; that it can thus put a restraining power upon the trust and equip itself, in a measure at least, for emergencies liable to arise.

One fact emphasizes these considerations. It takes six months to make smokeless powder, for it takes that long to dry it and exhaust the volatile elements that are in it. In this process there is a recoupment of some of these elements, which abate in a degree and in time the cost.

NEW CONDITIONS REQUIRE GOVERNMENT TO MANUFACTURE THE ESSENTIALS OF DEFENSE.

Mr. President, this is about the whole case. I could repeat this argument in various shapes; I could add to it illustrations from various parts of the testimony, but I feel that it is unnecessary to do so.

Like many Senators, I am reluctant to go into the Government manufacture of anything. I have been taught from my youth, and the experiences and observations of my manhood have impressed that teaching, that that government is best which attends to its own concerns and leaves the people to conduct their own concerns in their own way. These principles, however, grew up and became endeared to the hearts and minds of the people under very different conditions from those which now surround us. As self-defense is the first instinct of nature, so it must always be the first instinct and the first provision of nations. When the fact is told that our national defenses are menaced and that our public Treasury is invaded by a double monopoly, one of patent and another of combination, and that this monopoly holds the only source of supply for the materials of national defense in this country, the absolute necessity of a nation to be on guard for its public interest requires that Congress shall move forth to meet such conditions and to provide against them.

COMBINATIONS INSPIRE IDEAS OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

I have taken little stock, Mr. President, in those political philosophies which inculcate the idea that the Government ought to run the railroads or that the Government ought to build up monstrous organizations to conduct the business of this country in various departments. Those ideas receive stimulus from every combination that puts itself in the way of the Government drawing its supplies according to their value from independent manufactories and in open markets of this vast country of production. It is no longer a question of desire as to what might be. It is a condition and not a theory which confronts us; we must meet that condition and destroy it or circumvent it with whatever means we can.

It is stated as a fact, and in answer to a question put by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], that our battle ships as they go forth to the ocean are provided with powder only sufficient to sustain a fire of half an hour. The Department of War, which has control of the matter covered by this bill, desires to provide itself with enough powder to sustain a fire of two hours.

We have now but 4,000,000 pounds of powder on hand. In any general engagement or bombardment of any great war it would soon be shot into the air, and as matters stand to-day the Government would be at the absolute mercy of the powder trust. We have 12,000,000 pounds yet to purchase to put us upon a proper footing of preparation for defense. It is neither right nor just that we should leave ourselves thus stripped of the appropriate methods of that defense.

VAGUE APPROPRIATIONS.

There is one other thing, Mr. President, to which I desire to call brief attention. There are members of this body who have had much longer experience with appropriations than myself; but take up this appropriation bill and read it. As it came to the Senate it carried an appropriation of $4,838,993. An increase has been made by the Senate committee in some items, but as reported to the Senate it carries $4,350,669.90 less than the estimates. Let anyone take up this bill and look for the items. It is a dark continent in which he will find himself; it is a land of cloud and vagary. It deals in generalities, not glittering, indeed, but most general. Read the first six items—and most of the others are of like character.

For modernizing older emplacements, $150,000.

What older emplacements? Where? How modernizing them? Look to the Book of Estimates. There is just the slightest kind of information. Read the next item:

For construction of fire-control stations and accessories, including purchase of lands and rights of way, and for the purchase, installation, operation, and maintenance of necessary lines and means of electrical communication, including telephones, dial and other telegraphs, wiring and all special instruments, apparatus, and materials, coast signal apparatus, and salaries of electrical experts, engineers, and other necessary employees, connected with the use of coast artillery; for the purchase, manufacture, and test of range finders and other instruments for fire control at the fortifications, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $700,000.

An auction house, an old garret, the hotchpotch in the division of an estate—these are ideas that this appropriation suggests, and not that a body of American legislators are looking to where the people's money goes. And if you will look into the Book of Estimates—I need not produce it here and read it; it would take too much time—you will find very little light therein; some suggestive; some here and there specific. But after you have got it all you will not have an idea or half of an idea of what you are doing with this five or six or seven or eight million dollars which is being distributed.

THE PATENT MONOPOLY.

There is one other thing I desire to refer to before I close. There is one monopoly provided for in the Constitution of the United States. It is that of a patent. An impalpable conceit of the human mind is made property, to belong to the mind that conceived it. This was done in order to stimulate the researches and to reward the successes of thoughtful men. It is the value of a thought that is made an individual possession. Ideas govern the world and control the material things in it; and the United States has done well to give to the man who produces an original and useful idea of invention a property right therein and to secure him in the enjoyment of the fruits of his mental labor.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it will not disturb the Senator——

Mr. DANIEL. Just let me get through my idea.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is along the line of invention that I wish to inquire of him. Is it not the understanding of the committee—I so understood it—that if we use these patents in the manufacture of powder at the proposed powder factory, the Government will have to pay for those patents?

Mr. DANIEL. I am just introducing that subject, sir. I am coming to it.

Nothing that I am going to say shall derogate in the least against the ideal of the patent system. It is a great stimulus to the development of the human intellect and to the equitable and just securing to that intellect of the fruit of its cogitation, its inventions, its discoveries, and its toil.

Now, then, what are these patents which are now possessed by this great powder trust? Whose were the ideas that discover? How were these ideas derived? Since the invention of gunpowder, that nation which has had the best guns and the best powder, which knew how to use them, has been, as a rule, the triumphant nation. The United States, well aware of that, educates the young men of this country, in appropriate selections, at the West Point Military Academy and the Naval Academy at Annapolis. It takes them up in their youth, trains them in the way they should go, secures to them, if they are worthy, an honorable and well-compensated career; and when they grow old and can no longer work or fight it retires them with honorable title to rest, secured from want by salaries paid by the people and with honor in return for the fact that they dedicated their lives to the public service.

The United States at its own cost, paid out of the Treasury, provided experimental stations and sent officers of the Navy of the United States, who were detailed for the purpose upon continuing salaries, to make investigations into the manufacture of powder for its benefit. Two of those officers discovered or invented, while under the pay of the United States, while in the laboratories of the United States, and while employing their time and labor at the expense of the United States, this method of making this kind of powder for the use of the United States.

An illustration just here. Suppose we send a man-of-war to a strange region, and the commander of that ship discovers islands or countries which have not yet been possessed by civilization. Can he leap off the deck of his ship and claim those islands and countries for his own? Or does it become him to plant upon them the flag of the United States, whose uniform he wears, whose trust he embodies, and whose instructions he is obeying? No one would think of giving but one answer to that question. The answer is that the discovered land or country does not pertain to that man, but to the nation which sent him to discover it. Columbus discovered America; it belonged to Spain.

THE BERNADOU-CONVERSE PATENTS.

Now, then, Lieut. John B. Bernadou, of the United States Navy, and Commander George A. Converse, of the United States Navy, got out the patents on smokeless powders, or "nitrocellulose powders," as they are called. Specifications of the patents are printed in the record of the hearings before the Committee of the Senate on Appropriations.

They sold those patents to Charles A. Rutter, and Rutter sold them to the trust. It is not a wholly unfashionable thing for men educated in the United States, trained and raised up by the United States, enjoying honors and emoluments which they could never receive save from the United States, to quit the profession to which they had devoted themselves and go into private employment. When they get into those private employments they are as free as anybody else.

But I submit the question to the fair and disinterested mind: Is it fair, is it just that officers of the United States, while they wear their uniform, while they are paid out of its Treasury, while they are exercising their own faculties at its expense, with tools provided by it, and with all the costs borne by the United States, to discover something which they are there under the instructions of the United States to seek, and then patent their own ideas, and put up the price at which the United States has got to buy those ideas by selling out to somebody else, to get the benefit of it?

Mr. President, it is not my habit to make public accusations against anybody. I make none against these or against other officers of the United States who may be in the same category. I call in question no man's integrity, nor would I be warranted in doing so. I am speaking of a situation, a condition, and a system that exists in the open, and it is but right and just, in loyal service to the country, to state the facts; and if these are not the facts no man would be more gratified to learn otherwise than myself.

THE PRESENT STATUS.

In what status does it leave us? Not only these patents, but other patents have been absorbed by this trust. It has also absorbed the factories. It bestrides the continent like a Colossus, and here we are outside the breastworks. Those breast-works are fortified by ideas which, to use a metaphor of speech, were manufactured at our expense.

This status is somewhat moderated. Mr. President, the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department of the United States has a license, I understand, to use these Bernadou and Converse patents. They have passed into the hands of a third party—that is, from the patentees to Rutter, and from Rutter to the trust. It is not impossible, if we should go on and manufacture the powder, that somebody may make some trouble for us about it. I do not know. Clearly we might have some equitable right to do it, and, at any rate, we must take the trouble if it comes and do the best we can to meet it. Defend ourselves we must.

INVESTIGATIONS.

I am not going to move at this time, and I do not know that I will move at any time, to investigate this subject. I may, if I conclude the game is worth the candle. It is an era of investigation. Every day there are sensational lines in the newspapers and there is a public exploitation of some trust or some company that has done something or other which has shocked the people. Public indignation is being fatigued about it. We take it as a matter of course. It can not go on uninterrupted without piling up more and more trouble for the next generation. Many of the conditions which we now confront would never have arisen but for sectional and political differences in this country. The public mind of this country has been clouded, in a measure, for forty years. A serener atmosphere has come, and more normal conditions are just beginning to settle down and environ us. What do we find? A thousand things have happened that nobody had any idea of and would pay no attention to. Their minds were interested in other things. We are beginning to get tolerably well acquainted with each other in this country. I will say for myself that my view of it has very much improved upon better acquaintance.

The more I have known the country and its people the better I have liked it and them, and if I ever have had any narrow or bigoted ideas—even when a man discovers that he has, he does not like to say so—they have been vanishing in a large degree as I have better known and understood the genius of this great nation and its great people, and I would fain believe that such thoughts as these have passed in many other minds than my own.

There is no man of thought who contemplates the future of this country that will not do so first with gratification that his lot is cast here; second, with strong and profound hope for the happiness and prosperity of this people for generations and ages to come. There is nothing in the past and nothing now to depress the wholesome human mind or to have any other effect upon it than to arouse and stimulate it to its best exertions in the mighty conflicts of opinion which are before us. But anyone must also see that great dangers confront us and great problems rise before us. But great dangers have always confronted the nations. Great problems have always risen before them. The Sphinx is always sitting with its hands on its knees, asking the winds and the deserts questions which they can not answer. There are skeletons in the closets of every nation, just as it has been said there are skeletons in every family. As long as we are inhabiting this sphere some sphinx and some skeleton will always obtrude its unanswerable questions or present its grusome presence, and as time and patience and Providence rid us of one, lo! there comes another. The overhanging problem that is present is always the one that bothers. Now, the spirit of reform and of betterment in this country is moving amongst all its people, and we have to act upon these things when we come to them.

People talk about the long Senate debates. I say this in reference to the great debate which we have been having here for a month or two and which perhaps we will have for weeks or it may be for months to come. I do not believe that we have lost time in the Senate in any speech that has been made about the rate question or about interstate commerce. The newspaper man gets tired of it. He wants something fresh all the time. The people of the country get tired of it. They like to have a change of scene all the time. But, Mr. President, the men who are responsible for the measure when it leaves here are very different from the people who are amused or interested or entertained by reading what is said, and they know that they can not get at the truth, either of law or of fact, save by that patient industry and by that open mind which is willing to hear and to modify opinions as facts and views may be presented that ought to modify them.

There is not a man in this Senate who is not better prepared to-day to consider the question of rates, commercial relations, and legal jurisdiction than he was when this debate was opened. There are few here who will not be still better prepared when the debate closes. If we were to do nothing else for the next two months but hear the views of conscientious, enlightened, and honest men expounded upon this floor on this question, it would be time profitably used for the future of this country, although we might all be tired, and everybody else tired also.

Mr. President, this topic is but part of the more comprehensive problems we have to deal with. We can take but a step at a time. This step, as the Appropriations Committee thinks, is a wise, just, and expedient step; nay, more, a step indispensable to national safety and to good government. I hope that every Senator here will vote for the amendment. That act will speak for itself. If we can get powder for 35 or 40 cents, we have no business paying anybody else 70 cents for it. There, in the printed hearings, is the proof of what I have said, and you can read it. I make no personal charges, but I simply recount dangers.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF CORPORATIONS AND TRUSTS TO POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS.

One species of public scandal I call attention to, not that I know it is in the least applicable here; but I know that conditions, such as exist in this case, invite it. Whence come the great contributions we hear of—of $100,000, $250,000, millions of dollars—to political campaign funds, and what becomes of them? Where do they come from? Do they not come from men who have a graft on the Government of the United States, or do they not come, in the main, from men who expect to have their interests subserved in some special way by Congress? When corporations compel excessive prices from the Government they can put up money for those who serve them. The class of men who put up tremendous sums of money for political purposes are not the men who are known in the world for great philanthropy. I doubt if anyone would attribute to them pure ideals in their contributions. Neither are they men, as a rule, who are distinguished above their fellows for the generous and wholesome liberalities of life. I am not aware that the men to whom such things are attributed are men more patriotic than the average American citizen. They give no sign that they are more attached to our free institutions. I also question whether they have made any greater sacrifice for honest opinion's sake than the average good citizen of every State has made or is making or would make in either peace or war.

When the Congress of the United States knows the fact or has good ground to believe the fact that an organized association is getting more money out of the Treasury than it is entitled to, there is but one thing for it to do. Stop them, if there is any process to stop them, or do something else to better provide for ourselves. We have lately heard a good deal about due process of law and of the law of the land. No new process nor new law of the land has yet reached—we have no assurance that it can reach—to the breaking up of such concerns. There is a problem, an interrogation mark, that has as yet only eluded answers. We can, though, take a step to defend ourselves. And the manufacture of materials of self-defense is a very different thing from the manufacture of other miscellaneous and staple articles of commerce. We manufacture cannon; we manufacture small arms—guns and pistols and sabers; we build ships; we can not neglect powder; and that Mr. President, is this case.

Mr. DANIEL subsequently said: Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the city this afternoon to attend a funeral, and I may wish to put in the remarks I have submitted a little of the evidence and some of the data in the case, which I ask permission to do if I so decide.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Commercial agency report. Furnished by Robert S. Waddell.]

INTERNATIONAL SMOKELESS POWDER AND CHEMICAL COMPANY,
Wilmington, Del., November 9, 1905.

This business was originally incorporated under laws of New Jersey, April 7, 1899, under the style of the International Smokeless Powder and Dynamite Company, with an authorized capital stock of $10,000,000, $1,000,000 of which was preferred stock and $9,000,000 common, par value of shares being $50 each.

On formation of the company Lewis Nixon was president; W. W. Gibbs, vice-president, and Walter Woolcott, secretary and treasurer, and their office was established at No. 650 Drexel Building, southeast corner Fifth and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia. It was then claimed that 20 per cent of the preferred stock had been paid in in cash, and all of the common stock was full paid. They established works at South Amboy, N. J., where they purchased real estate and erected a plant. The greater portion of their capital stock was issued for patent rights.

In August, 1899, they submitted a detailed statement in which they showed total assets of $291,000, with no liabilities. Later on there was a change in the officers and parties at interest, Carl D. Bradley succeeding Lewis Nixon as president. Up to that time Nixon was understood to own the controlling interest in the business and is said to have invested considerable money in starting the enterprise, having purchased the control of the patents and exclusive sale of the Bernadou-Converse process of manufacturing smokeless powder.

The company succeeded in interesting Army and Navy Departments, who accepted their product, and they have of late years been steadily increasing the business, and statements submitted from time to time show large investment and accumulated surplus.

At a meeting of the stockholders held April 3, 1903, it was voted to change the name of the corporation to the International Smokeless Powder and Chemical Company, and H. C. Watts was at that time elected president, succeeding Carl D. Bradley, the latter being made vice-president and general manager. W. E. Steen had succeeded Walter Woodcott as secretary and treasurer about April, 1901.

On May 6, 1905, Henry C. Watts died and E. G. Buckner succeeded him as president. The business was largely augmented by a consolidation with the Du Pont interests, who were in the same line for many years at Wilmington, Del., and consolidation being effected about the 1st of January, 1 90, and subsequently the headquarters of the business moved to Wilmington, Del.

It is claimed at this time they continue an office for certain departments of their business at No. 850 Drexel Building, Philadelphia, but refer to William E. Steen, secretary and treasurer at Wilmington, Del., for full financial report.

The records show that the concern has sustained a good credit standing for some time past, and they are believed to have made money.

The last statement submitted was from inventory of December 31, 1902, and is as follows:

Also submits the following statement of the business for the year 1902:

INTERNATIONAL SMOKELESS POWDER AND CHEMICAL COMPANY,
Wilmington, Del., November 15, 1905.

Mr. W. E. Steen, interviewed for information concerning the affairs of the above firm, states that Wilmington is now their executive and only operating office, offices in other cities being simply transfer or sales offices. For future details as to their affairs he refers to Mr. T. C. Du Pont.

In response to request of the latter, the following is received: "In reply to request addressed to T. C. Du Pont advise that we have not adopted the practice of giving out statements of the International Smokeless Powder and Chemical Company. The company's affairs are in satisfactory shape, all bills being met promptly, and calls for credit are so few that it has not seemed advisable to make statements. I regret that no more definite information can be given at this writing.

"PIERRE S. DU PONT."

This concern is understood to be one of the many in which the Du Ponts of this city have purchased a controlling interest, and it is believed to be in capable and strong hands financially. Their connection inspire confidence in them here, and it is believed they are entitled to desired credit and that all bills and obligations will be met promptly. They, previous to coming here, maintained headquarters in Philadelphia, Pa.

INTERNATIONAL SMOKELESS POWDER AND CHEMICAL COMPANY,
DREXEL BUILDING, FIFTH AND CHESTNUT STREETS,
Philadelphia, Pa., November 16, 1905.

This concern has an office here for the transfer of stock only, the headquarters being at Wilmington, Del., where see for full report.

N. Q.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words. I would not venture to do that were it not that I think I should do so in justice to some of our Navy and Army officers who may think that we, by inference, perhaps, not understanding the facts, reflect upon their integrity or patriotism.

I wish to state that the committee were in full accord with the views expressed by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. We unanimously voted for and have recommended to the Senate this appropriation of $125,000 for the purpose of building a smokeless-powder plant for the use of the Army of the United States. The estimated cost, as has been stated, of the plant is about $100,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars was added to the appropriation for the purpose of fixing up wharves, railroads, and other roads leading to the works, wherever they might be established upon a Government reservation.

I will also state that the appropriation is for a plant with a capacity of 3,000 pounds a day of eight hours, or three times that capacity for twenty four hours. It will cost about $100,000, and is but a unit of a system of plants we can establish if this one proves to be a success.

In this connection I wish to state, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that several years since we provided an appropriation for the building of a smokeless-powder plant for the Navy at Indian Head, on the Potomac River. It has a capacity of about 600,000 pounds per annum, working eight hours per day.

At the Government plant the employees work only eight hours a day, as you know, Mr. President, and we give fifteen days' leave of absence a year, and there are seven days national holidays, making twenty-two days for which the Government pays and for which no labor is received in return. I am not reflecting at all upon the policy; indeed, I am in favor of it; but for about 7 per cent of the time the Government pays for labor and receives no return. Notwithstanding this fact, the Government manufactured the powder for 48.35 cents a pound, without counting any interest upon the investment or making any charge for insurance.

Mr. KEAN. Forty-eight and thirty-five one-hundredths cents a pound?

Mr. PERKINS. Forty-eight and thirty-five one-hundredths cents a pound. That is what it is costing the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Taking into account the labor?

Mr. PERKINS. The labor and all. That was the report to the Navy Department of the net cost to the Government.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Government pay for the powder which is bought?

Mr. PERKINS. We pay 70 cents a pound for the smokeless powder, the Government furnishing the alcohol, making that which we purchase from the powder manufacturers cost in the aggregate about 75 cents a pound.

I wish to say in relation to the patents which were invented by Lieutenant Bernadou and Captain Converse, now Captain Bernadou and Admiral Converse, that it is true they discovered this secret of manufacture of smokeless powder while they were in the employ of the Government, and the thought suggested itself to me that perhaps we were paying them a royalty upon it. I therefore addressed Rear-Admiral Mason, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, a letter in relation to these patents, and in justice to these gentlemen I wish to read his reply to me. I addressed a letter to him as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1906.

Rear-Admiral N. E. MASON, U. S. Navy,
Chief Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department.

DEAR ADMIRAL: Will you kindly inform me what consideration, if any, our Government paid for the licenses to manufacture smokeless powder for the Navy Department under patents 673377, 652455, and 652505?

May I also ask if, in your opinion, our Government has the right to use the formulæ contained in these patents in manufacturing smokeless powder under the license named for any branch of the Government other than the Navy Department?

Thanking you in advance for your reply by the bearer, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

GEO. C. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

Rear-Admiral Mason replied as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1906.

SIR: Replying to yours of March 21, 1906, relative to letters patent Nos. 673377, 652455, and 652505, covering processes for the manufacture of smokeless powder—

1. The Bureau has to inform you that the licenses to manufacture smokeless powder under the three licenses mentioned in your letter were made to the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, for a nominal consideration of $1 each.

2. These licenses are to the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, only, and state that they can be used for the purposes of the United States naval powder works at Indian Head, Md., or at any other works that may hereafter be built by the Navy Department of the United States.

3. From this wording it is the opinion of the Bureau that the patents could not be used by any other Department of the Government than the Navy Department.

Respectfully,

N. E. MASON,
Chief of Bureau of Ordnance.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, U. S. S.,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEAN. The War Department would have to pay royalty, would it not?

Mr. PERKINS. I was about to come to that.

Mr. KEAN. I only want to know what the saving would be to the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. The question was asked the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Army when he was before your committee, first, if the powder was manufactured under these patents. His reply was, in substance, that the powder is manufactured under a formula furnished by the War Department, and in his opinion it is not an infringement upon what is known as the "Bernadou and Converse patents."

I wish to make a further statement in behalf and in defense of these gentlemen, if they require any, which they do not, for since my experience here with the War Department and the Navy Department for the past ten or fifteen years I have never met a higher class of men, men of more patriotism and of higher honor in the performance of their duty than those who are connected with the Navy Department and with the Army. As evidence of that fact, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, General Crozier, with his colleague at that time, now General Buffington, retired, invented what was known as the "Crozier-Buffington gun carriage." It has been experimented with again and again by our Government, and by other governments, and has now been generally adopted by the Board of Fortifications and Defenses as the most efficient and at the same time the most economical gun carriage in cost of construction that is known in the world. It saves to us a great amount by reason of the reduced cost of manufacturing the disappearing carriage. The gun carriage at Sandy Hook cost, perhaps, $500,000—a 12-inch carriage—while the ordinary 12-inch disappearing carriages can be manufactured at from $50,000 to $60,000 each. The Board of Ordnance, in their report, which I have before me, composed of eminent Army officers, say it is the best carriage to-day that is known in the world. That invention was given to the Government by General Crozier and his colleague, General Buffington, without the consideration of one dollar. I do not know of any instance where the Government has paid a royalty to any Army or Navy officers for any invention which they have made.

Our statute provides that in the case of anyone in the employ of the Government making application to the Patent Office for a patent for which the Government is to have the use, no fee shall be charged for issuing the patent or in connection therewith.

I only make this statement in passing in justice to these men for whose skill we are indebted for these patents. It is true they were educated by the Government at the Military Academy at West Point or the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Their discoveries have resulted in great benefit to our Government. Yet a general statute, which I do not think is defective, provides that any person in this country, not even a citizen, may apply to the Patent Office, and if he has made a discovery for an invention of value he may obtain a patent for the same and be protected in it for fourteen or seventeen years, as the case may be.

The powder factory for which we have provided will produce nearly the quantity of powder the War Department requires for use during the year, which is about 550,000 pounds, and which is now costing us, as I said before, about 75 cents a pound. There is no question but that there is a monopoly in the manufacture of powder. Yet the question was asked the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance: "Is not every other powder company in the country invited to bid?" He answered in the affirmative that advertisements were placed in the papers and invitations were sent out to those who were engaged in the manufacture of powder, inviting them to submit bids to the Government to manufacture the powder for the Army in accordance with the formula furnished by the War Department. So it has been open to everyone to furnish this powder, and it is open to all to-day to do it.

I think this is a wise policy to enter upon. The reason why we did not recommend a larger appropriation is because the experience of the officers of the Army in manufacturing the powder will be of such great benefit to the Government that we will improve upon it as we go on, and add unit to unit in the factory, and it will hereafter give us a large reserve.

There is one other question which has not been referred to but which did not appear in the testimony before the committee. We are wholly dependent to-day upon niter that comes from Chile. Chile is the principal country that produces niter, and without nitric acid and sulphuric acid it is impossible to make smokeless powder. I wish to say in passing, however, that in California we have mines of niter which I believe will be developed now, since railroads are being built into those mines, and we hope that the problem will be solved. So I want to give notice here to Chile and other countries that in California and Nevada we will develop these great niter mines, and thus be independent of any foreign country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is that a trust?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, we trust in California only in the Lord, and that is the reason why we have been so successful in everything we have undertaken.

Mr. President, I think there is no objection to this amendment. I would not have referred to it except in defense of the Army and Navy officers, who, for their patriotism, their loyalty, and their individual honor, I think, are the peers of any, even of those who sometimes are sent here to represent the people in Congress. All the other amendments having been considered and disposed of, I hope that the pending amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I was present but a few moments during the observations of the Senator from California, and I did not hear whether he stated that these patents have been transferred by Bernadou and Converse.

Mr. PERKINS. I stated it quite fully.

Mr. ALLISON. Transferred to the present powder manufacturers?

Mr. PERKINS. No; not to the present powder manufacturers. I said they were transferred to the Navy Department of the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh; I beg pardon. I think the Senator ought to have stated also, at least it ought to be stated, that it appears from the testimony that although the Navy Department has a full right to manufacture this powder under the patents, it is a question whether the Government of the United States can do so.

Mr. PERKINS. If there be no objection, I will again place in the RECORD the letter addressed to me which refers to that fact.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator how long these patents have to run?

Mr. PERKINS. It was invented in 1895. I think they have some twelve years to run.

Mr. SPOONER. How does the question arise as to the right of the Army to use this powder? Were not these patents assigned to the Government?

Mr. PERKINS. They were assigned to the Navy Department; the inventors were naval officers.

Mr. SPOONER. I know.

Mr. PERKINS. And the Secretary of the Navy at that time, I presume, invited them to transfer it to the Navy Department.

Mr. SPOONER. How is that done? The Navy Department is a Department of the Government. It has no entity that can acquire property or title to a patent or anything of that kind. Is it transferred to the Government for the sole use of the Navy Department?

Mr. PERKINS. I will again read what Admiral Mason, Chief of the Bureau, says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1906.

SIR: Replying to yours of March 21, 1906, relative to Letters Patent Nos. 673377, 652455, and 652505, covering processes for the manufacture of smokeless powder—

This is in answer to my letter—

1. The Bureau has to inform you that the licenses to manufacture smokeless powder under the three licenses mentioned in your letter were made to the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, for a nominal consideration of $1 each.

2. These licenses are to the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, only, and state that they can be used for the purposes of the United States naval powder works at Indianhead, Md., or at any other works that may hereafter be built by the Navy Department of the United States.

3. From this wording it is the opinion of the Bureau that the patents could not be used by any other Department of the Government than the Navy Department.

Respectfully,
N. E. MASON,
Chief of Bureau of Ordnance.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senator, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLISON. That was the point I wanted to bring out. I thought it ought to be put into the RECORD.

Mr. PERKINS. However, the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of our committee, will remember that in answer to my query of the Chief of Ordnance, if in his opinion the formula which he furnishes the powder company to manufacture this powder is an infringement upon the patents named, he stated that in his opinion, and he gave it as a chemist, as I understand it, the formula is different, and therefore it would not be an infringement upon the patent.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to be permitted to state one further fact. These patents were transferred in 1899, after this license was given to the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy, to a gentleman in Philadelphia, who, it is claimed, as stated in the testimony, assigned the letters patent to what is known as the "Du Pont Company." So when we establish this powder factory we do run some risk that the opinion of General Crozier may not be the law of the case. I hope it will be; but we must take that risk, of course.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the Senator from Iowa states the case precisely as it is and as the evidence developed it before our committee. I will state, however, in addition, that the Navy Department in time of peace uses about eight times the quantity of powder per annum that the Army uses in time of peace. Last year there were used in the Navy nearly 5,000,000 pounds of smokeless powder, while in the Army there were used but 550,000 pounds of smokeless powder and 113,000 pounds of charcoal powder, the latter costing 8 cents a pound, and having been used for the purpose of firing the morning and evening guns, saluting the flag, and saluting honored guests.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTORS OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have the present consideration of Senate bill 4300, to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels.

I do not think that it is necessary to read the bill for the information of the Senate, for while it is quite a long bill it does nothing absolutely except to consolidate two inspection districts, Gallipolis, in Ohio, and Wheeling, in West Virginia, and to make an additional inspection district in Alaska. That is all the bill does. The reason of its length is that all the rest of it is existing law, but the section having been amended from time to time the Department was anxious that all the amendments should be comprised in one bill. So it does not seem to me that there is any necessity for reading the bill. I myself have examined it and know that to be so.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the Senator from Maine ought not to call up the bill in the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Ohio has already said that he does not object to the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. If there is going to be a consolidation and the office is to be abolished, of course I must bow to the will of Congress and to the economic streak that is now prevailing in the country. We are building a new public building in Wheeling and we are providing offices for inspectors of steamboats there. Of course I should be very sorry to lose the office at Wheeling, but as I said before, if I must bow to the economic streak that is now prevailing, I shall have to allow the Senator to call up the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Unfortunately for Wheeling there were only 34 vessels inspected there last year, and the inspectors can inspect 300 vessels without the slightest difficulty. The consolidation will save $3,000 a year to the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine at what point he will have the inspectors located under the bill?

Mr. FRYE. At Point Pleasant, when I can get the bill before the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. Point Pleasant, W. Va.?

Mr. FRYE. In West Virginia; and it is much more convenient than any other place on the Ohio for the inspection.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course we let go of a matter of this kind very reluctantly. Wheeling is the oldest steamboat-inspecting office on the Ohio River from Pittsburg to the mouth of the river at Cairo, and it is my home city. While I do not want to offer objections to delay the bill, I shall content myself by saying that I think we ought to be allowed to retain the inspector's office at the city of Wheeling.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. This seems to be a long bill. I see that it relates to the transfer of the location of inspectors, etc., in all the districts.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it does not at all. It makes only two changes. As I said, section 4414 has been amended from time to time, and the Department wished that the whole might be included in one bill. The only thing that this bill does is to consolidate these two districts and make one additional district in Alaska.

Now, Mr. President, I move to amend the bill, on page 1, line 4, by striking out the word "it," and at the end of the line, after the word "amended," I move to insert "so as to read." If amended the paragraph will read:

That section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I move to strike out from line 6 down to line 18, inclusive, on page 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. On page 3, line 11, I move to strike out the word "Parkersburg" and insert "Point Pleasant."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. On page 4, line 20, I move to strike out "Parkersburg" and insert "Point Pleasant."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. There is a provision for a clerk at $1,200. The Committee on Commerce, after investigation, became satisfied that good stenographers could not be employed at this place and in Alaska for $1,200, and they instructed me to offer an amendment increasing the amount to $1,600. On page 5, line 11, before the word "hundred," I move to strike out "two" and insert "six;" so as to read:

And he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,600 a year to each person so appointed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. There are no further amendments.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIVISION OF NEBRASKA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2769) to divide Nebraska into two judicial districts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that all that portion of the State of Nebraska which includes the counties of Cass, Otoe, Johnson, Nemaha, Pawnee, Richardson, Gage, Lancaster, Saunders, Butler, Seward, Saline, Jefferson, Thayer, Fillmore, York, Polk, Hamilton, Clay, Nuckolls, Webster, Adams, Kearney, Franklin, Harlan, Phelps, Gosper, Furnas, Redwillow, Frontier, Hayes, Hitchcock, Dundy, Chase, and Perkins, with the waters thereof, shall be detached from the judicial district of Nebraska, and made a separate judicial district and shall be called the southern judicial district of Nebraska; and the residue of the State of Nebraska, with the waters thereof, shall hereafter be the northern judicial district of Nebraska, etc.

Mr. BURKETT. I will state that the bill is in the regular form provided in such cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 16 and 36, in township 23 north, range 110 west; section 36, in township 23 north, range 111 west; sections 16 and 36, in township 22 north, range 110 west; sections 16 and 36, in township 21 north, range 110 west, and sections 16 and 36, in township 20 north, range 109 west; the lands so described having been selected under the grant of sections 16 and 36 for the support of the common schools of the State of Wyoming.

Mr. KEAN. I desire to have the report accompanying that bill printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed.

The report is as follows:

In lines 20-21, page 2, change the word "selection" to "selections."

"A bill providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof.

"Be it enacted, etc., That upon the delivery to the Secretary of the Interior by the State of Wyoming of its properly executed and duly recorded deed or deeds reconveying to the United States of America, in fee simple, certain lands heretofore selected by and certified to said State under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the admission of the State of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes,' approved July 10, 1890, to wit: South half of section 7, and all of sections 17, 18, 19, 20, 29, 30, 32, 33, and 34, in township 23 north, range 110 west; north half and north half of south half of section 3, north half and north half of south half and southwest quarter of southwest quarter of section 5, and all of sections 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14, 18, 20, 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32, and 34, in township 22 north, range 110 west; section 2, and the east half, northeast quarter, and north half of southwest quarter of section 10, in township 21 north, range 110 west; west half and southeast quarter of section 18, and all of sections 4, 6, 8, 20, 30, and 32, in township 22 north, range 109 west; west half of section 8, south half of section 22, and all of sections 6, 18, 20, and 26, in township 21 north, range 109 west; and all of sections 8, 22, and 26, in township 20 north, range 109 west; the land so described having been selected under the grant of 30,000 acres for the benefit of the miner's hospital, and grant of 30,000 acres for the benefit of penal, reform, and educational institutions in Carbon County, said selections being approved by the honorable Secretary of the Interior on March 6, 1894, and February 16, 1894.

"The said State shall be authorized and permitted to select an equal number of acres from the unappropriated public lands of the United States in said State in the same manner, for the same purposes, and subject to the same conditions and limitations under which the lands so reconveyed were selected and held.

"SEC. 2. That the lands so reconveyed shall be restored to and become a part of the public domain and be subject to disposal by the Government in the same manner in which other public lands of a like character are disposed of."

This bill authorizes the State of Wyoming, upon the delivery to the Secretary of the Interior by the State of its properly executed deed to certain lands heretofore selected by the State from the public lands of the United States under certain acts of Congress, to select in lieu of the lands thus reconveyed the same area of other lands from the public lands of the United States within said State.

The reasons why the State of Wyoming desires to make the reconveyance and select other lands in lieu of those reconveyed are set forth in the following communications from the State board of land commissioners of Wyoming, and from the governor, State engineer, and commissioner of public lands, viz:

THE STATE OF WYOMING, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, March 12, 1906.

DEAR SIR: When the State of Wyoming made selection of Government land for the benefit of the various charitable, penal, and educational institutions, as granted to it by the act of Congress July 10, 1890, the officers in charge of the selection, not desiring to select lands that would be in immediate demand by homeseekers, selected some tracts of land which would ultimately be irrigated in connection with sections 16 and 36 granted by the State for school purposes. While this policy was one fair to the prospective settler, the Government, and the State, it, however, has been found that the minimum price of $10 per acre, fixed by the act of admission, prohibits the sale of any considerable areas.

In case of certain lands selected for the aid of the Miners' Hospital along Green River, it has been found impossible to construct an irrigation system covering the State and other lands, on account of the price of $10 per acre for State lands, amounting to more than any profit which could be derived from the construction of a canal. If the State and school lands along Green River can be relinquished to the Government and equal areas of grazing and agricultural lands selected in other parts of the State, capital can be interested to undertake the reclamation of some 60,000 acres of land now desert in character and fit only for grazing purposes.

The supply of water in Green River is ample for the reclamation of all lands which can be brought under irrigation.

Practically all the lands desired to be relinquished are leased, but the leases are subject to cancellation at the option of the board. While these lands which the State desires to relinquish will no doubt in time be as valuable as any which may be secured by the State in exchange, yet the interests of the State are toward the early settlement of all lands susceptible of irrigation, and therefore we ask that we be allowed to relinquish the State and school lands contiguous to Green River, lists of which have already been furnished you, and select equal areas of lands in other parts of the State which will not obstruct development. The State board of land commissioners having considered this matter at its meeting of December 30, 1905, and authorized the president and secretary of the board, under authority of section 11, chapter 78, laws 1903, to relinquish the lands heretofore granted for the miners' hospital to the United States, if the State could be allowed to select other unoccupied public lands in lieu thereof, we respectfully ask that you use every effort to obtain such legislation as will enable us to make such transfer, as same will be for the public good.

THE STATE BOARD OF LAND COMMISSIONERS,
By BRYANT B. BROOKS, President.
R. T. FULLER, Secretary.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

THE STATE OF WYOMING, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, March 12, 1906.

DEAR SIR: A large tract of land lying along the western slopes of Green River Valley can be reclaimed from its desert condition when certain complications regarding the control of the area are removed. When the State made selections of Government land for the benefit of various charitable, penal, and educational institutions, it was the aim of the officers in charge of this work to obtain tracts which would ultimately be irrigated. This has been shown to have been a wise policy generally, but there is a considerable area of State lands along Green River lying under the line of a proposed canal which, unless it can be eliminated, will prevent the reclamation of at least 60,000 acres of land which is now desert in character and fit only for grazing purposes.

The waters of Green River have up to this time scarcely been used to an extent that measurements would indicate any diminution of the volume afforded by the stream. No diversions are practicable after the stream leaves the boundaries of Wyoming. It therefore seems necessary that steps be taken to bring about the largest use of the water in this State. Owing to the fact that the State lands can be disposed of only under the constitutional provisions, fixing the minimum price at $10 per acre, the irrigation project is not feasible until the State has relinquished its holdings thereunder and secured lands elsewhere in exchange. These State lands are desert in character, yet susceptible of reclamation, but neither the Government or private enterprise could be prevailed upon to pay $10 per acre for them in addition to the cost of reclamation.

If the entire tract can be taken together as a part of the public domain capital can be induced to take up this project, which will mean much to western Wyoming. Unless the State lands can be exchanged at this time, the entire area lying under this project must await reclamation until the demand for irrigated farms will warrant the payment of a fee to the State of $10 per acre.

We have already furnished you with a list of the land which the State desires to exchange for Government lands elsewhere. Lands can be selected in other localities which will bring an equal revenue in rentals and will not obstruct irrigation development.

Respectfully,

BRYANT B. BROOKS,
Governor.
C. SOMERSET JOHNSTON,
State Engineer.
ROBERT P. FULLER,
Commissioner of Public Lands.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office reports that the reasons assigned for the desired legislation appear to be good and sufficient, and approves the bill with the amendments heretofore noted; and the Secretary of the Interior concurs in the Commissioner's recommendation.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior and recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 10, 1906.

SIR: I am in receipt, by reference from your committee requesting facts and information touching the subject-matter of the proposed legislation, of S. 4628, entitled "A bill providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof."

Said bill was referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and on the 6th instant he submitted a report thereon, a copy of which I have the honor to inclose for your full information in the premises.

The Commissioner entertains no objections to the bill so far as selected lands are concerned, but thinks the right to relinquish granted school sections in place with the privilege of selecting other lands in lieu thereof should be denied, and recommends certain amendments in the event that Congress sees fit to permit any relinquishment of the lands described in the bill.

I concur in the report.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1906.

SIR: I am in receipt by departmental reference, for report in duplicate, with recommendation and return of papers, of Senate bill No. 4628, "Providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof."

The lands are described by legal subdivisions, and it is recited were "selected under the grant of 30,000 acres for the benefit of the miners' hospital, said selection being approved by the honorable Secretary of the Interior on March 6, 1894;" and the described sections 16 and 36 as "having been selected under the grant of sections 16 and 36 for the support of common schools."

The lands described in the bill comprise selections for the miners' hospital, approved March 6, 1894, amounting to 14,453.84 acres; and selections for penal reform and educational institutions in Carbon County, approved February 16, 1894, amounting to 8,952.47 acres, and the school sections 16 and 36, amounting to 5,760 acres, passed to the State upon its admission, no selection thereof being necessary to complete the grant. Attention is called to a misdescription in line 11, page 2, of the bill: The "southwest quarter of section 18" should be the "southeast quarter," as the description "west half" immediately preceding in line 10 embraces the southwest quarter.

By act of July 10, 1890 (26 Stat., 222), there was granted to the State of Wyoming, for common schools, sections 16 and 36 in every township, or indemnity therefor, where same had been sold or otherwise disposed of; also grants of land in quantity for various purposes, including 30,000 acres for a miners' hospital and 30,000 acres for penal, reform, and educational institutions, in Carbon County. The last-named grant has been satisfied by the approval of selections and has been closed since February 7, 1898. The grant for miners' hospital has been satisfied by approvals to the extent of 28,771.23 acres and selections aggregating 1,400.63 acres are pending, which is more than sufficient to complete the grant.

A measure similar to this bill is found in the act of April 23, 1900 (31 Stat., 139), "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," and in reporting that measure before its enactment it was stated (letter "G" of January 18, 1900):

"It has been the policy of the Department to accept, prior to approval and certification, the relinquishment of the States of lands selected and permit other lands to be selected in lieu thereof, on good cause shown, accompanied with evidence that none of the land so relinquished has been disposed of or encumbered by the State, but where the lands selected have been certified to the State 'there is no authority in the Department to accept a reconveyance of said lands with a view to allowing the State to make other selections in lieu thereof.' (State of Montana, 27 L. D., 474.)

"It has been represented to this Office that the described lands, which the State desires to relinquish, are desert in character but susceptible of irrigation, and are in a thickly populated region; that as the State of Wyoming, under its constitution, can sell none of its lands for less than $10 per acre, and as these lands without irrigation will not command such a price, the holding of them by the State retards the development of that region, as they would all be speedily settled upon and reclaimed if they could be entered under the laws of the United States.

"This Office has in similar cases accepted the State's relinquishment of unapproved selections, and I therefore recommend the passage of the bill * * *."

In the present case it is represented that the State is unable to sell these lands at the price fixed by the State constitution, namely, $10 per acre; that said lands may be reclaimed, in connection with other lands, under the provisions of the act of August 18, 1894 (28 Stat., 372, 422), and it is the desire of the State to reselect the tracts under the provisions of the act cited, commonly known as the "Carey Act." Thus the State will be enabled to carry out the intended system of reclamation, and be reasonably assured of a revenue sufficient to defray the expenses of construction of such a system and obtain a reasonable price for the lands.

While the policy of permitting States to relinquish approved selections is one that should not be sanctioned as a general proposition, I am of the opinion that where satisfactory reasons are shown for such a course, and no injury will result to the Government, no objection should be made thereto.

The reasons assigned in this case appear to be good and sufficient, and I therefore see no reason why the bill should not become a law, so far as the selected lands are concerned.

As to the sections 16 and 36, these sections are granted to the States in place, and the title vests in the States upon identification by survey, where the survey is subsequent to the act making the grant, or at the date of admission of the State where the survey is prior thereto, provided the lands are nonmineral in character. No other consideration as to the character of the land can affect the grant. The State takes sections 16 and 36 for school purposes, if not previously sold or disposed of whether good, bad, or indifferent, and indemnity or lieu lands can only be taken therefor where said sections have been disposed of, or are mineral lands, or embraced in a reservation, or subject to some claim that prevents the State's title from attaching.

This provision for indemnity or the selection of lands in lieu of granted lands in place is general, and, so far as I know, no special privilege has heretofore been granted to any State in the matter of surrendering its granted school lands in place after the State's title had become vested and taking other lands in lieu thereof, and an exception in this case is more than apt to invite requests for like exceptions in others. The right to relinquish these granted school sections in place with the privilege of selecting other lands in lieu thereof should be denied.

Should Congress see fit to permit any relinquishment of the described lands, I recommend the following amendments:

In line 11, page 2, strike out the word "southwest" and insert in lieu thereof "southeast."

In line 20, after the word "hospital," add the words "and grant of 20,000 acres for the benefit of penal, reform, and educational institutions in Carbon County."

In lines 20–21, page 2, the word "selection" changed to "selections."

In line 22, page 2, after the word "ninety-four," add "and February 16, 1894."

Strike out lines 23, 24, and 25, page 2, and lines 1 to 8, inclusive, page 3.

The said bill is returned herewith.

Very respectfully,

W. A. RICHARDS,
Commissioner.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 23, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire before the Journal is approved to suggest a correction in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was informed that the Journal reads that the gentleman from Mississippi moved, after the conferees were appointed, the resolution which was sent up to the Clerk's desk on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that part of the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thereupon the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BURK, and Mr. MOON of Tennessee as managers on the part of the House at said conference. Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, while the names of the conferees were being announced, had sought the floor to move to instruct the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives to agree to the amendment of the Senate striking the provision admitting Arizona and New Mexico out of the bill as it passed the House. This motion Mr. WILLIAMS made after the conferees were announced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Journal recites that Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi "had sought" to make the motion while the conferees were being announced. The gentleman from Mississippi was recognized after the conferees were announced, but the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Speaker, "sought" to be recognized before the conferees were announced and not while the conferees "were being announced." That is a plain matter of fact. The gentleman from Mississippi was upon his feet howling—literally howling—from the very moment that the Chair announced that the resolution had been adopted, and while he was not "recognized" by the Chair until later, his howling, or seeking for recognition, Mr. Speaker, began before the Chair had even handed to the Clerk the paper upon which the conferees' names were entered.

I ask that the Journal be corrected, and instead of saying that the gentleman from Mississippi had "sought to be recognized while the conferees were being announced," that he "sought to be recognized before the conferees were announced." He was not actually recognized until afterwards, but he "sought" to be recognized before the conferees were announced. Now, Mr. Speaker, to let the Journal go in its present shape puts me in the absurd attitude of having sought to make a motion at a time when a hundred precedents in the House were against me as to its being in order. It was in order, and claimed by me to be in order, only between the adoption of the resolution and the announcement of the names of the conferees.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to make a single suggestion right here, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. It is this: That the rule provided that the Speaker should immediately appoint the conferees; and nothing else was in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not arguing that.

Mr. PAYNE. What the gentleman said was disorder and out of order and should not be recognized in the Journal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not arguing the point of order. I am seeking to correct this statement of facts in the Journal. There is no man in the sound of my voice, not even the gentleman from New York, who does not know that I was on my feet seeking recognition before the conferees were announced and all the while they were in process of being announced. I am not arguing the legal effect of the rule; I am not arguing a parliamentary question. I am stating a fact.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not propose to have any controversy with the gentleman as to that, but I proceeded to make a statement just now that was in order, and before I could finish the statement the gentleman again took the floor in disorder and tried to make another statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be indulged for a moment. The Chair is presumed to examine the Journal, and it is his duty to do so before it is submitted to the House. In practice, in fact, the Journal clerk and the clerk to the Speaker's table, from necessity, perform this duty. Now, if the Chair's attention had been called to this Journal, the Chair would have made it state what parliamentarily is the fact. The Chair will read:

So the resolution was agreed to. Thereupon the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BRICK, and Mr. MOON of Tennessee as managers on the part of the House of said conference. Mr. WILLIAMS—

Now comes the interlineation—

Mr. WILLIAMS, while the names of the conferees were being announced, had sought the floor to move to instruct the conferees on the part of the House to agree to the amendment of the Senate to strike the provision admitting Arizona and New Mexico out of the bill as it passed the House. This motion—

Now again the interlineation—

This motion Mr. WILLIAMS made after the conferees were announced.

Now, to tell the truth exactly as it is from the parliamentary standpoint, and as the Journal, in the opinion of the Chair, ought to tell it, would read as follows:

"Thereupon the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BRICK, and Mr. MOON of Tennessee as managers on the part of the House at said conference."

Now, the following:

"Mr. WILLIAMS moved to instruct the conferees," and so forth.

"Mr. DALZELL made the point of order that the motion was not in order.

"The Speaker sustained the point of order."

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi, in his efforts, as he [illegible] and as the Chair is aware, to attain the floor, failed to obtain the floor, and no gentleman can obtain the floor without recognition from the Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no dispute about that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Very well. Now, the RECORD——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I object to is that following—that the gentleman from Mississippi, "while" the announcement of the conferees was being made, "had sought."

The SPEAKER. One moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you are going to put in anything about "sought," put it at the time I "sought."

The SPEAKER. The interlineation that the Chair has called attention to, the Chair is informed that the Journal clerk had it as it occurred. The interlineations were suggested by the clerk to the Speaker's table, and in the opinion of the Chair the interlineation ought to be stricken from the Journal, and it should read as follows:

"Thereupon the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BRICK, and Mr. MOON of Tennessee as managers on part of the House at said conference.

"Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, moved to instruct the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives to agree to the amendment of the Senate striking the provision admitting Arizona and New Mexico out of the bill as it passed the House.

"Mr. DALZELL made the point of order that the motion was not in order.

"The Speaker sustained the point of order."

Mr. WILLIAMS. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me, Mr. Speaker. Striking out these interlinections will leave the Journal in a condition perfectly satisfactory to me. Of course I could not, in a parliamentary sense, make a motion until "recognized," and was not, as a matter of fact, "recognized" until after the announcement. But if the Journal was going to enter into a statement as to the time at which I sought recognition, I wanted it to be stated correctly.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal will be corrected as indicated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think this is an important precedent and ruling of the House. In other words, the precedent that is now before the House is that where a rule provides for the appointment of conferees no intervening motion can take place. I do not wish to argue the point of order. The Chair and the House have decided that. But I do not think the condition of the Journal shows the real point and precedent. As the Journal will now read, with the indicated portion stricken out, it will simply leave the Speaker, sustained by a hundred points of order, holding that a motion can not be made to instruct conferees after they have been appointed. Now, I take it—and I am sure it is so—that the Speaker of this House would not by mere force, in view of the fact that he is in the chair and can refuse to hear, prevent a gentleman from making a proper motion. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was on his feet yesterday when the vote was announced and before the Speaker handed to the Clerk the names of the conferees. The Speaker did not recognize him.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I take it that the Speaker did not recognize him because he ruled that under the rule pending before the House he was not entitled to recognition. It was not because he would not hear him——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But because he did not think the gentleman from Mississippi was entitled to recognition. Now, that is a precedent that has not been established before in this House, and one that I think the Journal ought clearly to show for the future reference and guidance of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the interlineation, indicated by the Chair, will be stricken from the Journal. The Chair hears no objection.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted instead of to-day for the consideration of the business on the Private Calendar which would be in order to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for to-day.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. For the consideration of business under the order referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16172—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, as well as record books, telegrams, telephones, books for library, furniture and carpets for offices, care of office carriages, horses, and harness, and miscellaneous items, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the paragraph which I send to the Clerk's desk, to be inserted immediately after the language just read.

Mr. LITTAUER. I reserve points of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, in line 3, after the word "dollars," insert: "For the purchase of a proper car or cars and equipments for the use and benefit of the President of the United States, who is given full power to purchase the same and report his action to Congress, $100,000, or so much thereof as is necessary."

Mr. LITTAUER. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we have just passed the usual appropriations for the benefit of the President of the United States, and we have done so, I want to say, regardless of whether he is a Republican or a Democrat. Amongst other things we include "carriages, horses, harness," and so forth—everything to make the President comfortable in getting about this city in the transaction of his official business. It is necessary, Mr. Chairman, for the President (like the Supreme Court judges, who, in the main, are elderly men) to have carriages and horses not only for the actual transaction of purely local "executive" business, but also for the "official diplomatic visits" that, as I understand it, he is compelled to make out of official respect and duty to representatives of various foreign governments, and other official courtesies which he extends. In other words, these visits are just as official and necessary as any other official acts of the President.

Now, then, it is also necessary for the President of the United States to make, and he does make, I presume—certainly he should make—official visits to West Point, to Annapolis, to see our men-of-war and ports, and to our various barracks and public Federal institutions. He is, under the Constitution, Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Official visits are necessary for him to personally, as he should, inspect our various naval and military establishments. The President has, at his official call, a small vessel for carrying him to our various naval precincts that he may overlook and look after our Navy and men, but we do not provide, Mr. Chairman, any conveyance for carrying him to a single inland public place or to the shore—not one. When he goes, it is announced a week or two weeks ahead of time that he is going on an official visit; then he must go down and some car must be improvised for him and his necessary official and clerical party. This is a great inconvenience to him, and I dare say causes loss of valuable time. It is a great inconvenience to the railroad to make him comfortable, not as an individual (President Roosevelt or any other President is an individual in one sense), but as President. He is President wherever and whenever he goes within the jurisdiction of the Republic, State, or Territory.

He can not shut the gates behind him and say, "that no business shall follow him." He can not strip himself of his official functions. He can not shut business from his office on land or sea. It will follow him, it must follow him, whether he would have it or not. This is because of his great and far-reaching official functions and duties.

There are international matters that come up while the President of the United States is absent from the White House. He must, away from his office, attend to these.

The people expect him to make these official visits; a healthy public policy requires him to make personal inspections and to mix with the people and see and learn their local condition and wants, and hear what they want from their own lips. If we purchase a car, I do not know exactly what it will cost, but I understand "private cars" cost all the way from $50,000 to $90,000. That is the mere "private car." Of course this amendment contemplates that there should be the proper adjuncts in the nature of baggage and express cars, etc. My amendment calls for "$100,000, or so much thereof as is necessary" to accomplish this object.

Now, then, as he can not shut business off, the business will follow him, both domestic and international. If he must carry his officers with him, he must carry his papers with him; they are valuable papers, vital to him, and some of them on secret subjects, or they collect while he is away from the White House. They may be on secret subjects and should be secret. And yet he must go in an ordinary car that has ordinary appurtenances and conveniences where nothing can be kept safely or in absolute secrecy.

Certainly, we ought to make it not only convenient but absolutely safe for the President at any time to make these official visits, make him comfortable, and make his papers and all his necessary paraphernalia absolutely safe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the House for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended ten minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am glad for the purpose of my argument that the President is a Republican. If a Democrat, you would say that I was trying to make this Democratic President have an easier, pleasanter time than I would if he was a Republican. You can not say that here. There are no politics in it. I am looking at the situation from a healthy public point of view. A healthy public policy demands that this be done, or something along this line.

The President of the United States is liable to be taken sick at or away from the White House. Whether taken ill at home, or in the White House, or at any place, this private car might be much needed. I believe, in the case of General Grant, he was taken up to some cool place, some mount, where I think he died. They improvised some sort of an arrangement after much delay—as I remember it, there was much delay (for want of a proper car) in carrying that victim of disease to the place where he could stay and try and save his life. I believe at that time General Grant was an ex-President, but I state the other facts substantially correctly.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Is it your purpose to have this train subject not only to the acting President, but to ex-Presidents?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; no "ex" about it—absolutely for the acting President of the United States.

Mr. PRINCE. Then what has the sickness and trouble of General Grant as an ex-President to do with this matter?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I referred to his case as a noted illustration, merely to show what might happen to an acting President. If General Grant had been President it would have been all the same. Delay would have occurred, just as it would to-day if the President was taken ill and had to go to some place to try and save his life.

Now, when Garfield was assassinated, my recollection is, although it has been a long time, he was at the Union Depot. He was going away, and he had to wait for ten days or more after the doctors wanted to move him, in order that the railroads might improvise a car to carry him somewhere—I believe to Long Branch. I remember distinctly that while a houseful of doctors were hovering over him, trying to save him, we were waiting for the railroads, who acted promptly and patriotically, to improvise some sort of a car to haul him. Indeed, they had to make a car to carry him—to carry him in such a temperature, in such a position, and at a certain velocity without shaking him, and so forth and so on. Now, suppose the President to-day had to be treated in that way. Suppose the doctors would hold a council to-day and say that the President, ill unto death almost, should be moved to Atlantic City in order that his life might be saved. Would not the very heart of the nation rise up and say, "Take him; take him at an expense of $50,000 or $100,000; take him at any expense?" And how? Take him in a rattling car—rough, stuffy car that we ride in? Why, of course, under the circumstances, we would have to take him in that kind of a car. In the case of President Garfield, I think I am entirely correct in saying that we had to build a special car to carry him, so dreadful was his condition.

Again, the railroads, under the law—the commerce act of 1887—have no right to give, free of charge, to the President of the United States, or anyone, a train in which he may go around the country on social or official trips. The law is specific. I think it ought to be more specific, but it is specific as it is construed, and not enforced, I may add. Such "courtesies" are unlawful discriminations, and prohibited. Only railroad officials and their employees and a few others, not including any Federal officer, have the right under the existing law to ride free of charge over interstate railroads of this country. So that if the railroads tendered a car or train to the President on an official journey or on a bear hunt, if you please, to accept it would be against the law, and, by the way, in hunting bears he is still President of the United States, and he still may have to transact at night in some little insecure place, in some insufficient place, some ill-equipped and unsafe car, official business, domestic or foreign, which goes to the very vitals of the American Republic. If we give him this car—and I do not mean a regular train with an engine, I do not mean an engine at all, but I mean a car or cars, nothing but something that is proper, as the resolution provides, to protect and care for the President and his papers when he is obliged to leave the White House on a trip——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, how is he going to get it pulled?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, get an engine that we know is all right and employ an engineer that we know is all right and get a fireman that we know is all right and a good conductor. We do not want them sitting around here for weeks waiting to haul the President. We will employ them when we need them.

Mr. JAMES. What are you going to do when he is hunting bear?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When he is hunting bear let him pay his own expenses, but when he is hunting up his duty, when he is looking after the business of this Government, why, we ought to pay the expenses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown that under the law the railroads can not haul the President free of a legal charge, and that if they do, they use cars insufficient and unsafe, and in case of sickness we have nothing, absolutely nothing. Suppose, when President McKinley was assassinated at Buffalo, it had been necessary to take him instantly to Florida or to take him to some cool place—I happened to be in the Philippine Islands at the time of his death; I do not know exactly the condition of the temperature here. Now, suppose it had been necessary to carry him somewhere in a certain way, we would have had no instrument with which to carry him properly; whereas, if he had had a President's car, he could have been carried swiftly, promptly, easily, with all the necessary equipments to add to and prolong his life.

Mr. Chairman, another proposition. The President of the United States has to treat with the railroads of this country, and should do so and with all other Federal carriers; and if he accepts "courtesies" from these railroads, which I repeat is against the law, it makes him a lawbreaker and makes the railroads lawbreakers, whereas, if we give him a car, it puts him above that and makes him independent of our railroads. To accept the "courtesies" I have referred to may embarrass the President in his heroic and patriotic action in legislating about railroads and in seeing the laws faithfully enforced against railroads, and enforcing the law, I may add, in behalf of the railroads, for they have legal rights that ought to be protected, and so have the people, that should be protected. If the President accepts these courtesies you will find that the American people will criticise him, as they do the Members of Congress and the Federal judges, I may add, who accept these favors; and thus their influence is lessened and the officer and the law are brought into disrepute. I say, put the President above the possibility of such criticism. Make him free and absolutely independent. Do this and I believe the American people, as they should, will indorse it. Whether you adopt this proposition here to-day or not, there will come a time when this great Committee on Appropriations or the great lawmaking committee of this House will pass a law along the lines I have suggested and for the reasons and the purposes that I have outlined. I say that a healthy public policy, fair dealing with the President, and the public welfare, requires such a provision as this, and hence I offer the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order. This is new legislation heretofore unauthorized, and while I am quite convinced of its necessity, as depicted by the gentleman from Tennessee, yet I feel that a matter of so great importance ought to have the consideration of a committee like the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, so well equipped to determine what the equipment of this train ought to be, before we undertake to legislate upon it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does he believe that the railroad companies should furnish the President a private car when he travels?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was just going to ask that. They do, and it is against the law—the commerce act of 1887.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, there is no reason why I should express an opinion on this matter. I do not see how it is connected with anything in this bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does not the gentleman from New York think it is wise and does he not think it is the duty of this Congress to provide a proper car for the Chief Executive to travel in?

Mr. LITTAUER. That may be, but not to provide it in this appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman yield for a moment? In going to West Point—and the President ought to go there we will all admit—how does he go; how are his expenses paid? Now, you are a member of the committee that is the debt-paying committee of this House. How are those expenses paid?

Mr. LITTAUER. I take it for granted they are paid out of his own pocket.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If not, then how are they paid?

Mr. LITTAUER. I could not tell, because no item of appropriation has ever been submitted here to take care of any such expense.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will pardon me for a moment. Here is information I get from the press, to which I think the President is entitled, and I am glad to praise it—that he pays now his own way, and began to do so about ten months ago on his recent trip out West—on that bear-hunting trip—and on all of the other trips since then he has paid his expenses, and I am told by the press that he cut short the length of the train, too. He cut short the immense party that usually goes when the railroads give free a train to the President or when the Government pays the expense. Now, should not the President visit Annapolis or our military camps; and if so, who pays the expenses?

Mr. LITTAUER. I take it for granted the President pays them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If not, who, then, does pay them?

Mr. LITTAUER. I could not tell you. I have no information regarding these matters. There never has been any item of appropriation that would lead us to investigate this subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, has the gentleman or his committee investigated this subject?

Mr. LITTAUER. We have not. It is not indicated here that there is any expenditure for any such purpose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you not think the Government should provide something of this sort?

Mr. LITTAUER. If you are going to ask my personal opinion, I believe, perhaps, it would be well that we might have a train and provide in many other ways for the President, but I do not believe this bill is the place for us to consider it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman bring in matters changing legislation on this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not of that kind or character.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What about clerks and employees?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is another condition—it is a continuing service, practically going on now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, as a matter of fact, you have certain things in this bill now changing existing law.

Mr. LITTAUER. There are changes of existing law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That means making law for the time being?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. I move to strike out——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will pass upon the point of order. The second clause of Rule XXI declares that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The Chair does not understand that there is, but on the other hand understands that there is not at present any authority of law for an expenditure for the purposes covered by this amendment. It is an entirely new proposition, and therefore not in continuation of any public work already in progress. The Chair must, therefore, sustain the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what mileage is paid when the President goes on his official trips?

Mr. LITTAUER. I would answer the gentleman from Tennessee that I have no knowledge that any mileage is paid.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The legal presumption is that it is paid.

Mr. LITTAUER. It may be paid, but there is nothing in this bill or in any appropriation bill brought to my attention where there is any such provision.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If by this amendment or under any other system it was paid, the Government ought to pay for it while on the train, of course.

Mr. LITTAUER. Naturally.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And furnish him room to live in while on the train.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to say that we congratulate the committee that the gentleman from New York in charge of this bill has at last joined the force that is seeking to prevent any new legislation from being carried in this bill. But independent of that proposition I want to correct one statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee. He states the usual amount is appropriated for the contingent fund of the Executive Office, as I understand him. I wish to call attention to the fact that the contingent fund is increased by this appropriation. If I did not believe that it was not subject to the point of order, I would raise the point of order against it. Not because, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the President of the United States having as much of a contingent fund as may be necessary. I agree with gentlemen who say that he is, perhaps, underpaid, and I might be willing, if the proposition was submitted to the House, to vote directly with them to increase his pay. But I want to say this: If I have not got my history wrong, the contingent fund was about $500 in Jefferson's time and $1,000 in the time of Lincoln, even when we had the greatest war the world has ever seen, and it has gradually grown until now, in times of peace, it is raised from $18,000 last year to $20,000 this year. Why is it raised? There is no member of the committee who can tell, because, forsooth, the President, nor even a clerk in his office, has come and told the committee why they wanted a little more money. It may be that my bump of irreverance is too well developed, but I think that when it comes to appropriating money there ought to be no distinction made by the committee whenever anybody asks that the money should be taken out of the Treasury, whether it is by the lowly or the mighty. It seems that the President's clerk or somebody else sends up a letter to the committee saying that we had a contingent fund of $18,000 last year and we want $20,000 this year. The committee says that this is the President's clerk and we will not even question him why he wants the money and for what purpose he needs it. Now, I do not believe that the President himself would approve that. I do not believe his public utterances or private record would permit him to take such a position. There ought to be some explanation of this expense, just as there is an inquiry into the salary of the humblest clerk on the Government rolls, and if I stand alone I shall enter my protest against such a practice. If this statement provokes any assault on me from the self-constituted defenders of the White House, I am ready to stand here and defend my position. I say that it is wrong for anybody to get an appropriation of public money out of the Treasury without being required to give an explanation why that increase should be made. I do not make a motion to reduce it, because the committee will be able to beat the motion, but I do protest against it. I object to an increase being made without any statement being given by anybody on earth to anybody on earth as to why it is needed.

I think everybody ought to be treated alike and fed out of the same spoon, from the President of the United States down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For three Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,500; assistant chief examiner, $2,250; two chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; three examiners, at $2,000 each; six clerks of class 4; thirteen clerks of class 3; twenty-two clerks of class 2; twenty-six clerks of class 1; twenty clerks, at $1,000 each; ten clerks, at $900 each; five clerks, at $840 each; one messenger; engineer, $840; two firemen; two watchmen; one elevator conductor, $720; three laborers; and three messenger boys, at $360 each; in all, $163,390.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I want to make several points of order on this paragraph. I will begin with the first one, page 34, beginning in line 9, with the words "three examiners, at $2,000 each." That is new legislation, not authorized by law, and in violation of the second section of Rule XXI of the House. I reserve the other points in their order as we come at them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. LITTAUER (to Mr. PRINCE). Do you reserve the point of order?

Mr. PRINCE. On every one of them.

Mr. LITTAUER. You reserve the points of order?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; I make the point of order on this one, and I will make the points of order as they follow. I will take them up as we come to them. If the Chairman desires that I make them all at one time, I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it will be the more orderly procedure to do so.

Mr. PRINCE. Then I will make them on the same page—34—beginning on line 11, with the words "twenty-two clerks of class 2." These employees are new, unauthorized by law, and in violation of Rule XXI of the House. That is all, as read thus far.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must recognize the right of the gentleman from Illinois to make the points of order that he has just stated. The positions referred to are not authorized by law, but very full and ample reason was given why the force of the Civil Service Commission should to a certain extent be reorganized, with a view of making it better applicable to the work now in hand, and as that work has developed.

Mr. TAWNEY. And reducing expenditures.

Mr. LITTAUER. And, moreover, reducing the expenditure from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. These changes reduce it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems to me that the rules permit appropriations for additional clerks in the classified service in the Departments at Washington, when the service enlarges so as to justify them.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman must bear in mind though that the Civil Service Commission is not a Department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is in a Department.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is an independent bureau, as I understand it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The question was settled when the Army bill was before the House. A point of order was made against the employment of additional clerks, and the point of order was sustained, because they were employed in the field and not in the service at Washington. Now, I think within the meaning of that law the Civil Service Commission, even if it is not under the general control of any particular Department, is a Department in and of itself. Certainly it is within the spirit and purpose of the law, because everybody recognizes that if the business of the country and of the several Departments grows so as to make an occasional addition to the clerical force necessary, it certainly can not be that every time a new clerk is to be appointed to the force in the Departments here, it is necessary to secure an independent act of Congress in order that the Committee on Appropriations may provide for that clerk.

Now, does not the gentleman believe that the Civil Service Commission is a Department within the meaning of the statute?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe that the intent ought to cover it, but I also know that it has ever been considered, not as a Department, but as an independent bureau, and even if it were a Department, the provisions of the statute the gentleman has reference to only apply, as I understand it, to clerks in the various classes, 1, 2, 3, and 4, and messengers and laborers, while the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois first made was to three examiners at $2,000 each, and services of that class would clearly be subject to the point of order, even if the Civil Service Commission were a part of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are not those three examiners within the classified service?

Mr. LITTAUER. No. It seems to me that in order to be not subject to the point of order a direct provision of law would have to be made for such service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The other point the gentleman from Illinois makes is against the provision of law which provides for twenty-two clerks of class 2. He says that is an increase of six clerks. Those clerks are in the classified service, and as this question is one of some importance and is liable to come up frequently, I suggest that the statute be referred to, so that we may know exactly what it does provide.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that the Revised Statutes provide for clerks by classes. The provision is for clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4; and section 169 of the Revised Statutes authorizes Congress to appropriate for these clerks, including messengers and laborers, in the Executive Departments in Washington. Now, the Attorney-General has decided that the term "Executive Departments in Washington," as used in this statute, applies only to the Departments presided over by Cabinet officers, and the Civil Service Commission is an independent bureau. The only jurisdiction the Department of the Interior has over it is to provide for a home for it by renting buildings that the Commission occupies. That is practically all the control it has over it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I decline to yield. Therefore the only clerks that can be provided for in an appropriation bill under the rules of this House are clerks in the Executive Departments, presided over by Cabinet officers, in classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, and laborers and messengers. The law fixes the compensation of these clerks, beginning at $1,200 in class 1, up to $1,800 in class 4; so that there is no question in my mind, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a Department within the interpretation of that law as given by the Attorney-General; and even if these examiners were to be employed in one of the Departments they would not be in accordance with the provisions of that law, because it provides only for clerks of these four classes and laborers and messengers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to put in the RECORD at this point, in connection with the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, a letter from the Civil Service Commissioner showing the necessity for this reorganization of the force in that Bureau, as provided in this bill. This does not increase the appropriation, but diminishes the appropriation in the current law for this identical service.

Mr. PRINCE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not yield.

Mr. PRINCE. A parliamentary inquiry and a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. If I recollect correctly, I made the point of and I insist on the point of order. I did not reserve it, and if I did the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman reserved the point of order and asked for an explanation.

Mr. PRINCE. I made the point of order, and I insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Minnesota is discussing the point of order, and is in order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am, Mr. Chairman. Now, the Commission, on page 58 of the committee print of the bill, states specifically the necessity for this reorganization and just what the effect of it will be, both as to the aggregate amount appropriated for the service and as to the question of improving the administration of that particular Bureau of the Government. It is as follows:

In the last appropriation act provision was made for transfer to the force of the Commission of the employees constituting its field force, but who were detailed from other branches of the service, and for the transfer of the employees constituting the rural carrier examining board. These two forces, however, were appropriated for separately. In the present estimates the employees constituting the field force and rural carrier examining board are consolidated with the regular force of the Commission. This will be advantageous in the matter of transfers and promotions. In the interest of good administration it is frequently necessary to transfer an employee from the office force to the field force or to the rural carrier examining board, or to transfer an employee from the field force to the office of the Commission. There is no extra expense attached to this consolidation, and if the estimates as submitted are approved the force of the Commission will have more mobility and may be used to the best advantage of the service.

Attention is invited to the following changes in the present estimates as compared with the appropriation for the present fiscal year: (1) The position of "chief of board of examiners of rural carriers" is dropped; (2) the designation of "rural agent for rural carrier examining board," at $2,000 per annum, is changed to "chief of division," at the same salary (the rural carrier examining board is a division of the Commission, now occupying rooms in its building); (3) the designation of "law clerk," at $2,000 per annum, is dropped, and in lieu thereof estimate is made for an additional clerk, at $1,800 per annum (the law clerk is a chief of division with a large force under his supervision; it is proposed to call him "chief of division" and to reduce one of the present chiefs of division to clerk, at $1,800 per annum); (4) a clerk, at $1,400 per annum, is dropped, and in lieu thereof estimate is made for an additional clerk, at $1,600 per annum; (5) six clerks, at $1,200 per annum, are dropped, and in lieu thereof estimate is made for six additional clerks, at $1,400 per annum; (6) estimate is made for one additional clerk, at $1,000 per annum; (7) one clerk, at $900 per annum, is dropped, and in lieu thereof estimate is made for one additional messenger, at $840 per annum; (8) two clerks, at $800 per annum, are dropped, and in lieu thereof estimate is made for two additional clerks, at $840 per annum, and (9) two clerks, at $600 per annum, are dropped, and in lieu thereof estimate is made for two additional clerks, at $720 per annum.

The increases asked for in clerical salaries are for the purpose of giving more stability to the force. The Commission has experienced great difficulty during the last year in retaining its clerks on account of the many low-salaried positions and the consequent slow promotions. There were twenty-nine separations from the force since the last estimates were submitted.

The number of employees estimated for is the same as the number provided for in the current appropriation, but the rearrangement of salaries results in a slight decrease as compared with the salaries for the current fiscal year. The following table is a summary of the changes in appropriations for salaries, traveling expenses, text-books, stationery, printing and binding, and contingent expenses. The last three items are appropriated for under the Interior Department:

Summary of changes in appropriations.

	1906.	1907.	Increase.	Decrease.
Salaries	$231,090	$230,910	.....	$90
Traveling expenses	10,000	8,500	.....	1,500
Text-books	250	250	.....	.....
Stationery	5,000	5,000	.....	.....
Printing and binding	25,000	22,500	.....	2,500
Contingent expenses	5,000	6,500	$1,500	.....

Decrease in estimates, $2,590.

There is, in my judgment, authority of law for all the increase provided for in the paragraph which the gentleman has made a point of order against so far as the number of clerks is concerned.

I will withdraw that, Mr. Chairman. I was proceeding on the basis that it was a department of the Government. Inasmuch as it is not a department of the Government, it is unquestionably true that this House can not on an appropriation bill increase the number of clerks, no matter how great the necessity may be, and although the Commission in its letter to Congress shows the necessity for this, shows that it reduces the expenditure, shows that it will result in improvement of the administration of that Bureau, nevertheless, under the strict enforcement of the rule upon the point of order being made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, this reform, this economy, can not be accomplished by this House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER and Mr. LIVINGSTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, this is not the usual case that comes under the rule referred to where salaries are increased, where expenses are increased. This is a reorganization of the Civil Service Bureau, and in the reorganization we have absolutely reduced the expenses of that bureau. The reorganization was authorized by the last appropriation act. It takes it entirely out of that category covered by the rule. Is it possible that your Appropriations Committee can not reduce expenses without a point of order being made on them? It is just the reverse; if expenses are reduced it is not covered by the rule. The authorization to do this is contained in the last appropriation act. There is the authorization for it, and we have reduced the expenses and bettered the service; and I contend that neither the spirit nor the language of the rule will cover the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, it seems that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] insists upon his point of order, and that he is reenforced by the entire Committee on Appropriations. [Laughter.] There is nobody on this floor to defend the right of the Civil Service Commission to employ help in the line of its service unless I shall undertake that task.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to the law on this subject. The statute provides for the classification of the executive civil service, or its division into certain classes, and fixes salaries for all of the classified service of the country. Then it provides that each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers and assistant messengers, etc., respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, take that in the connection that it must be taken in this statute and it clearly contemplates that the chief officer of any Department or branch of the public service that is within the classified service of the Government has the right to employ additional clerks if Congress makes the necessary appropriation therefor. Can it be said now, for instance, that the Civil Service Commission is not within any of the regular Departments of the Government? It is an independent branch of administration. The head of that branch is the Civil Service Commission itself. Its clerical force is within the classified service. This entire statute, of which I have read only section 169, applies to the Civil Service Commission as well as it does to the other Departments. The meaning of the statute is that the chief officer in any of the Departments—the head appointing officer in any of the Departments that the classified service applies to—shall have the power to make appointments of additional clerks in the classified service when Congress makes the appropriation. It seems to me like a very technical interpretation of a statute, the absolute overlooking of its spirit, a sticking in the bark theory, to say that because popularly the Civil Service Commission is not given the rank and dignity of a Department in the Government Congress did not intend in the enactment of this statute that the Civil Service Commission should have the same right to employ additional clerks in the classified service that is conferred upon all those Departments that are specifically authorized to employ clerks in the classified service. It is clearly within the spirit of the law, and it seems to me for the purpose of making appropriations it must have been the intention of Congress that the Civil Service Commission should be included. There is no reason why it should be excluded, and the Commission is a Department in the sense of this statute, because there is no officer above it who has the power to make appointments for it. The Commission itself, therefore, has the power to make those appointments. I believe in any court in this country the Civil Service Commission would be held to be a Department within the meaning of this statute, and the Commission would be authorized to employ additional clerks as its business expanded and made that employment necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule which has been invoked against the specified items in this paragraph is found in the second paragraph of Rule XXI, which provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Now, it is urged that there is no authority of law for the appointment of so many clerks of certain classes as are specified in the paragraph. On the other hand, it has been suggested that authority may be found in section 169 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

There is no doubt that as to any branch of the Government which is properly a "Department" within the meaning of that act, Congress may, from year to year, appropriate for an increasing number of clerks, but the question arises, Is the Civil Service Commission a "Department" within the meaning of the statute? It may be that there is very good reason why, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] suggests, it ought to be treated as a Department, but has it been? Is it one within the terms of the statute?

By reference to section 158 we find that the Departments to which the act was applied are specifically enumerated; they are those governmental branches or executive divisions at the head of each of which there is a Cabinet officer. They are distinctly specified and set forth by name in section 158. Section 159 expressly declares that when the word "department" is used in that statute, it shall be held to mean "one of the Executive Departments enumerated in the preceding section." The Civil Service Commission is not one of the Executive Departments specified in section 158, and it can not therefore be construed as a Department, nor any member of it as the "head of a Department" within the meaning of section 169. Whether the Civil Service Commission is a governmental agency of such value and importance that it ought to be treated as a Department is not a matter for the Chair to decide. As it is not one within the terms and intendment of section 169 of the Revised Statutes, the Chair must rule that that section is not authority for the appropriation so as to relieve it from the operation of Rule XXI. Now, whether the second clause of Rule XXI is unduly restrictive upon the Committee on Appropriations, or upon the House itself, is not for the Chair to determine. The Chair must construe the rule as he finds it. In fact, the same question appears to have been decided in the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, who sustained a similar point of order. For the reasons stated, the Chair sustains the point, or rather the two points of order which have been submitted for his decision.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TAWNEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BEVERIDGE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. PATTERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 117. Joint resolution extending the time for opening to public entry the unallotted lands on the ceded portion of the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming; and

H. R. 15848. An act authorizing the sale of timber on the Jicarilla Apache Indian Reservation for the benefit of the Indians belonging thereto.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 19.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey and examination of the Ohio River at or near Cincinnati, Ohio, for the purpose of establishing a suitable ice harbor.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph from line 5 down to and including line 20, on page 34. I believe that is all that has been read up to this time.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, is a motion of that kind now in order? The paragraph has been read and debate has been had.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate was had upon a point of order. The point of order had to be disposed of before an amendment could be heard. The Chair thinks the amendment is in time.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, for a great many years I have studied the civil-service law as it is on the statute books, and I have also looked into its operations as a practical question, as one that was intended to give to this country a better civil-service administration, and I want to say that, in my judgment, it has produced, it has brought about, more in the way of extravagance, more in the way of abuse in matters of government, than any other law that has ever been placed upon the statute books of this nation.

I might go further and say that the reforms attempted by the Appropriations Committee, and about which there has been so much debate here in the consideration of this bill, are made primarily and are intended to correct just such abuses as have grown out of the operation of the civil-service law. I want to say, and say most emphatically, I do not believe in the wisdom or efficiency of the civil-service law. [Applause.] I believe it is contrary to the institutions of this country as a matter of principle, and in its operation it can not be made to carry out the views of those theorists who intended and who believed and who brought the American Congress to act on the proposition that a great good might be accomplished. In its practical operation, when the Democratic party is in power the civil service of this country is a Democratic civil service, and when the Republican party is in power the civil service of this country is a Republican civil service [applause], so that I am opposed to the law and wish to express my dissent here and now by moving to strike out this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division, demanded by Mr. FINLEY, there were—ayes 24, noes 41.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have tellers on this.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee have doubtless seen in the newspapers reports of what Mr. Wallace, late the chief engineer at Panama, had to say about the inefficiency of the Civil Service Commission in furnishing him good employees. Now, his charges are just like the charges which have been made by the gentleman who last spoke and who moved to strike out this paragraph. I will read just what Chief Engineer Wallace testified before the Senate committee:

Senator SIMMONS. I want to ask you what you meant a little while ago when you said that you had a great deal of trouble in keeping incompetent men away.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, the class of men that sought positions there was the class that could not find anything to do here. The class of men that we wanted there was the class of men that was already employed here.

Senator SIMMONS. Do you have reference to men that went down there after having stood the civil service examination?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir; I do, most emphatically. What I am about to say may not be strictly accurate. It is simply my recollection of the circumstance, as I did not keep any record of it. It came up in the course of business. I asked for twenty-five track foremen, in order that I might lay the necessary tracks in the dry season to enable the work to be done during this last wet season. When those men came on the Isthmus out of the whole twenty-five I do not think there were two of them that could drive a railroad spike.

Senator SIMMONS. Those were men sent down by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Senator MORGAN. On civil-service examinations?

Mr. WALLACE. On civil-service examinations; yes, sir.

Now, upon inquiry of the Civil Service Commission I have learned just how accurate this distinguished gentleman was in the information which he imparted to the Senate committee and the country, and how careful he was to fortify himself concerning the facts before making his charges against the Civil Service Commission, now doing such magnificent work for the public service of the United States. He said that these twenty-five men all came to the Isthmus after having passed the civil-service examination as to their fitness, and yet the fact is that of the whole twenty-five only two took civil-service examinations, the other twenty-three having been selected by representatives of the Isthmian Canal Commission itself in the United States, and of these two who passed examinations before the Civil Service Commission one of them had worked from June, 1897, to April, 1905, almost eight years, practically continuously, as a track laborer and assistant foreman and section foreman with the Union Pacific Railroad, and the other had worked continuously for fifteen years as a bridge carpenter, trackman, and section foreman on railroads of the United States and Mexico.

It is very evident that these two men must have known how to drive railroad spikes. Mr. Chairman, Engineer Wallace said that these twenty-five men had come down there, all incompetent, not two of them knowing how to drive a railroad spike, and that they all had passed the civil-service examination here; and yet the truth is that only two out of twenty-five passed the civil-service examination, and they had been for years employed by railroad companies in the United States.

Mr. WACHTER. Does the gentleman maintain that the two that were mentioned by Mr. Wallace are the same two that took the examination?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know as to that.

Mr. WACHTER. Well, that is what you want to find out. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Undoubtedly, as the two examined had each worked for years on railroads here, they must have known how to drive railroad spikes, so that there is no point in the statement of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WACHTER. There is no point in the gentleman's argument in the talk made here.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more to elucidate for the benefit of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WACHTER. I will not object, provided that the gentleman proves that the two that passed the civil service are the same two that Mr. Wallace referred to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I can not prove that.

Mr. WACHTER. Well, then, your argument has no point.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But I can prove that the gentleman is in an intellectual fog, perhaps. The gentleman is like a ship in a fog, which hears nothing but its own toot. [Laughter.] Now, I want to call attention to the irrelevancy of the gentleman's comment. Engineer Wallace did not say that two of these twenty-five men could drive spikes. On the contrary, he testified that he did not think there were two of them who could drive spikes. He declared that twenty-five men came to the Isthmus, not even two of whom, in his judgment, could drive a railroad spike, and that they had all passed the civil-service examination. I established by the record of the Civil-Service Commission that this statement was entirely inaccurate, because these two examined were men who had worked for years as laborers and track foremen on railroads in the United States, and therefore must have known how to drive railroad spikes.

Mr. WACHTER. I want to say to the gentleman that as I understand——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You misunderstood; that is all.

Mr. WACHTER (continuing). That only two had taken the examination, and twenty-three had reported without examination?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Wallace testified that there were twenty-five who had been taken down there, all of whom had passed the examination.

Mr. WACHTER. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought so. The last three minutes have been profitably employed.

Mr. Chairman, there is another statement which was made in the House the other day, "That none resign who get into the civil service after having passed an examination." This is frequently said. Here is a little bit of fact which is rather instructive. In the past five years, in the force of the Civil Service Commission itself, 75 were appointed from the registers after examination, 23 by transfer and 3 by reinstatement. Of this number 35 have resigned, 11 of them for the purpose of accepting appointments in other branches of the service. This makes 24 out of 101, almost 23 per cent of the Civil Service Commission employees, who have voluntarily resigned; and the Civil Service Commission say that the trouble is not that men stay too long, but that they do not stay long enough in the service of the Commission. Energetic men, many of them, resign. The Civil Service Commission report that about 10 per cent of the employees who go into the employment of the Government as a result of examination voluntarily resign.

We hear men denounce the civil-service law because, as they assert, it creates a "favored class." How is there any "favored class?" No man can well be more inaccurate in the use of language than when, in this connection, he talks about a "favored class." Any young man in my district—a Dane, an Irishman, an Englishman—whatever the nationality of his parents may have been, wherever he himself may have been born, can, without any regard to the services he may have rendered to me, or to any other man in public office, go before the Civil Service Board, and if he can pass a satisfactory examination may obtain a position in the service of the Government. That opportunity exists for rich or poor, without regard to nationality. There are several employees in the service in this city from my Congressional district whom I had never personally known until they came and introduced themselves to me.

They came in under the civil-service law. They are entitled to come, without regard to whether or not I want them to come, and without regard to politics, religion, or nationality. It is a contradiction in terms to talk about a "favored class" under that sort of a law. Nobody in this country inherits a right to hold office. In some countries of Europe there is a titled nobility to whom the right to hold public office and often the right to make laws comes by inheritance. That is a "favored class." But in this Republic there is no "class" entitled to hold office under the civil-service law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Field force: For three examiners, at $2,200 each; four examiners, at $2,000 each; two examiners, at $1,800 each; one clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,600; one clerk, $1,200; seven clerks, at $1,000 each; six clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; five clerks, at $840 each; two clerks, at $720 each; one messenger boy, $480; in all, $42,160.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make points of order against the following provisions:

First, on page 35, beginning at about the center of line 1, the words "seven clerks, at $1,000 each." Heretofore there have been six. I make a point of order against the one additional.

Again, in line 3, page 35, "five clerks, at $840 each." I make a point of order against five. There is an addition of three. Two should remain.

In line 4, "two clerks, at $720 each." I make a point of order against those two, and all for the usual reason, under clause 2 of Rule XXI. I make the point of order against each and every one of those provisions.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, under the rulings and the rule, I must admit that the point of order bears upon all these officers. At the same time I want to emphasize the statement just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], wherein he gave the facts, showing how large a proportion of the clerical force of the Civil Service Commission had resigned from office. I would supplement that by stating that they resigned because the salaries attached to this force are, as a rule, lower than prevail in other Departments of the Government, and so low that the Commissioner who appeared before our subcommittee stated—

It is almost imperative that that should be cleared up—

Meaning the inequality of compensation—

if we are going to carry on our work. It is almost impossible to keep these people at the salaries we now pay them.

The gentleman from Illinois, in his right, brings a point of order to bear upon the provisions which your committee believe to be the small necessary increases of force at higher compensation and which, in the end, by the elimination of other clerical force, would make the total expenditures in connection with the Civil Service Commission less than under current law.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, a word in reply. It is quite likely that the chairman in charge of the bill has stated what is the truth with reference to the Civil Service Commission. There is a committee of this House known as the "Committee on Reform in the Civil Service," to which a proper bill could be referred, properly considered by that committee, and brought into this House for consideration.

As the Chairman has properly held, this is not a Department. It is one of the subordinate divisions operating under the executive branch of the Government, and if there is a necessity for additional clerks let a bill be introduced into this House, properly considered by the committee to which it is referred, and brought into this House, and I am frank to say to you that I will not oppose any measure which has for its purpose the betterment of the service of the United States in any of its branches; but under the rules of this House this is no way to legislate. No man in this House can tell how these rolls may be padded. There is no means of getting at it. We may be criticised by some for doing what we are doing, but we want to know how these men are placed on the rolls; we want to know by what authority of law they are placed there, and some of us have stood here under the rules making objection; and in every instance practically where we have made objection under the rules, Chairman after Chairman occupying the position that you now occupy, Mr. Chairman, has held in accordance with the rules of the House. Why criticise us for doing our duty?

I am not here criticising gentlemen of the committee, but I am only asking them to live under the rules that they want us to live under. The rules of this House are invoked time and again, and when the time comes it is a rare instance for me to oppose the rules. More than ten years have I been in this House, and at no time when a rule has been brought in along the lines of party policy have I ever refused to stand by it. I have stood for the rules of this House and stand by the rules to-day, and I am insisting upon the rule; and the gentleman very properly says that these provisions are subject to the rule, and he makes no objection to the point of order. Then what is his answer for bringing them in here when he knows that they are contrary to the rules of this House?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an observation in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], who attempts to justify his course and the course of his colleague from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in their opposition to certain provisions in this bill upon the ground that under the rules of the House the House can not consider a provision in an appropriation bill providing for the salaries of the clerks that are engaged in carrying on the public service. Now, if you will follow to its logical conclusion the position of the gentleman from Illinois, this House for the next five years would have no time to do anything else than to take up in the several Departments the necessity for legislation, for the purpose of increasing one clerk in one bureau and a number of clerks in another bureau, and in another division, and it would absolutely make the House of Representatives ridiculous.

The course which the Committee on Appropriations has followed in this bill has been the practice ever since I have been a Member of this House, which has been fourteen years. When the departmental officers submit their estimates to Congress they submit an estimate not only for the clerical force they then have on the rolls, but if the growth of the service in their respective Departments has been such as to necessitate an increase in that force that increase is included in the estimate, and the demand for it is investigated by whom? Investigated by the committee that reports the appropriation for carrying on that service, and if, in the judgment of that committee, the additional clerical force is necessary, the committee invariably reports in its legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill the necessary increase in positions and the necessary increase in salaries.

There is no other way to provide for the increasing demands of the Departments except by introducing bills for the increase of specific salaries and then have these bills go to the respective legislative committees; these committees consider the necessity, and then bring in a bill providing for an increase, say, of one clerk in the Post-Office Department, and perhaps one or two clerks in the Civil Service Commission, or an increase in the salaries or an increase in the number of chief clerks, etc.

I say the enforcement of this rule as interpreted makes the House absolutely ridiculous. I am not finding any fault with the rulings of the Chair, but when these gentlemen make their points of order and explanations are made for the necessity for the changes in current law or the reasonableness of the increase in salaries that have been reported, even though these changes result in an aggregate decrease in the expenditure of the public money, they nevertheless are not satisfied.

It is not to enforce the rules of the House, it is not to protect the House against any violation of its rules, that this policy has been inaugurated by these gentlemen; that is not their motive. If it were they would accept the statements made here on the floor as to the necessity for these changes in the interest of better administration and in the interest of economy.

Mr. Chairman, we may as well face this situation now as any time. If this rule is to be enforced, then more than one-half of the provisions of this bill will have to go out. More than one-half of the provisions of any legislative bill that has been reported to this House for the last ten years could not have been considered. We have certain provisions in this bill where clerks were employed under a lump-sum appropriation, a practice that has been criticised by this House, and the Committee on Appropriations has been the particular object of that criticism for not bringing in specific appropriations defining these places and salaries to be allowed to each one of them.

As the result of the investigation made by the Committee on Appropriations, in three or four instances were found lump-sum appropriations, in almost every instance we find that where the head of a Department is employing clerks under a lump-sum appropriation the salaries are a great deal higher than when the salaries are provided for specifically in appropriation bills. As the result of the changes we have reported to the House in three bureaus a reduction, a saving to the Government, of $12,511 is accomplished. But under the policy of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] and his colleague from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], if their policy of making points of order is pursued by them, it is absolutely impossible for this House to effect any reform or any reduction in the salary or any improvement in the public administration by reclassification or otherwise, for the reason that to do so would be obnoxious to the rule. Similar provisions have heretofore been reported from the Committee on Appropriations in this same bill, but they remained in the bill notwithstanding they were obnoxious to the rules. They remained in the bill because in the interest of good administration and in the interest of economy there was no man on this floor who objected to the enactment of provisions of that kind. Now, no matter how great the economy may be, no matter how beneficial these reclassifications may be in the administration of public affairs, these two Members say they can not be considered. They even refuse to allow this House to consider any one of these proposed changes. If they were acting in good faith they would at least permit the House to consider propositions of that kind when they are informed that as a result of this legislation we are saving the people's money and improving the public administration of our public affairs.

Now, if these provisions did not suit the House, or any Member of the House, that Member has a perfect right, under the rules of the House, to amend, if he desires to do so. If the salaries which have been reported here are in excess or greater than what they think they ought to be, they have the right to offer an amendment if they see fit to do so. I speak of this, Mr. Chairman, merely for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that if we are to go on here day after day under the technical policy of these gentlemen I want the country to know who is responsible for it and why they are pursuing the course that they are. I do not want them to give it out to the country that they are actuated by motives of economy when they refuse to allow this House to consider a proposition which results, if enacted into law, in saving money to the public or improving the public service. Now, they have a perfect right—any Member has a right, if he sees fit to exercise it—to make points of order against these provisions, but this House ought to remember and the country ought to know that a point of order deprives the House of an opportunity to consider whether or not the provisions are wise or unwise—whether or not they would result beneficially to the Government or not. And when, contrary to the uniform practice of this House of considering provisions of this kind by unanimous consent, the country will know that these men set themselves up as censors, not in the interest of good administration or in the interest of economy—when the country knows that they are depriving the House of an opportunity of considering provisions in the interest of economy—I imagine that their course will not meet with that popular approval which it is evident they hope or anticipate it will by their claiming that they are doing this for that purpose. Why, just a few minutes ago, as a result of their policy, they have made it necessary to increase the public expenditures. They have by their policy made it impossible for us to improve the efficiency of one of the branches of the Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit, in all candor, that if this policy is to be followed out we may as well proceed with the reading of this bill, have everything stricken out, whether it reduces or does not reduce public expenditure, and then rewrite the bill in the language of the current legislative bill and let it go to the other branch of Congress, where these proposed reforms and changes may be considered. I will not say that there is any purpose or intention on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to do this, because it is not necessary. Those things can be corrected under the parliamentary procedure of the House, and they will be, but it will involve simply going over this bill again. It will simply involve the time necessary for reconsidering every one of these provisions which, by the policy of these gentlemen, the House is now deprived of the opportunity of considering. The House is competent to determine whether these changes should be made or not. The plan proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] is absolutely impractical. If these changes are not right, or if these provisions should not be enacted into law, if we should not cut down the forces in the Executive Departments as we have done in this bill, if we should not change around and reclassify as we propose in this bill, it is a matter that the House can by a majority vote determine. But the attitude and the policy of these gentlemen is to deprive the House of the opportunity of accomplishing anything of this kind.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House in a brief time upon the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order and will do so, and then submit the gentleman's request. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], says that if we persist in asking for the rules of the House to be observed, we are obstructionists; that we are not acting in the interests of economy; that this bill and many of its provisions will fail, and, in fact, half of the bill, as he stated before, would go out on a point of order. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, speaking for myself only, I have not made a point of order against any reduction of expenses in this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, he did.

Mr. PRINCE. Wherein, sir?

Mr. TAWNEY. In respect to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. PRINCE. You have brought in a bill which, you say, reduces it, have you not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir; $2,590.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well. In the first instance, let us see what it means. On page 34 I have asked two chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each, be stricken out. That can not be an addition. I have asked twenty-two clerks be reduced to six clerks. That can not be an addition. I have not changed any provision of the law. Can that be an addition? That is subtracting, not an addition. On page 35 I have asked that seven clerks be reduced to six. Is that an addition?

Mr. LITTAUER. But you know the force as you have emasculated it can not remain so, that it has to be put back one way or another, else the work of this bureau be given up.

Mr. PRINCE. Is it possible that one clerk at $1,000 can disarrange the entire bureau?

Mr. LITTAUER. Your statement covered more than one clerk.

Mr. PRINCE. Can it be possible that two examiners who heretofore have never existed can disarrange the entire bureau?

Mr. LITTAUER. The work that these examiners are detailed to perform has been going on, and they are now in this service.

Mr. PRINCE. In the old bill there were none of them there, and this Commission has existed ever since when? Will the gentleman from Ohio tell me when the first civil-service bill was passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was passed in 1883.

Mr. PRINCE. And it is the only one that has been passed, has never been modified or amended?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Never.

Mr. PRINCE. So the machinery is there as it is and in running order, and now I say and deny I have reduced it. Very well, what else?

Mr. LITTAUER. How many clerks do you reduce in that paragraph?

Mr. PRINCE. I mean I have not increased it; I have reduced it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Nine clerks in one paragraph.

Mr. PRINCE. Six clerks in one paragraph. Can that be an addition?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; but you render it incompetent to do the work.

Mr. PRINCE. I will answer any question you put to me.

Mr. LITTAUER. We might be able to get along without the whole force, but we can not get along without a well-ordered force.

Mr. PRINCE. You gentlemen representing the Committee on Appropriations have declined to restore the old law. I have offered an amendment on the floor of this House to restore the old law, and you decline to do it. You stand here and cripple the service, not I.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. As a result of your point of order you have made this readjustment of the service of the Civil Service Commission proposed in this act absolutely impossible, thereby necessitating a new provision restoring the service as it is at the present time, the result of which will be to increase the number of clerks to the extent of three and the aggregate appropriation by $2,590.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well. Suppose you leave the law as you have proposed it and reduce these clerks, do you mean to say that the business of that bureau can not be discharged at all?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. You mean its efficiency is entirely destroyed by the absence of one or two clerks?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; it is curtailed.

Mr. PRINCE. A good many believe the tail should be cut entirely off.

Mr. TAWNEY. It necessitates going back to the old arrangement, that is all.

Mr. PRINCE. Let us go a little further. What is all this discussion about? It is about a mere bureau. What points of order have heretofore been made upon this bill, padding the rolls of the House, increasing numbers of employees connected with the House of Representatives? Has there been a move on the part of anybody here to cripple the great Departments of this Government? Not a word of it. Wisely has the distinction been made between the Departments of the Government in giving clerks in sufficient number to carry on the business of this country. You are arguing along the line of fly specks more than giving a broad consideration to the great Departments of this Government of ours with more than 300,000 clerks. Now, what is the law? The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 158, page 26, Title 4, says:

> The provisions of this title shall apply to the following Executive Departments:
> First, the Department of State; second, the Department of War; third, the Department of the Treasury; fourth, the Department of Justice; fifth, the Post-Office Department; sixth, the Department of the Navy; seventh, the Department of the Interior.

And while it does not name the Department of Commerce and Labor, I would not raise the point against that Department. While it does not name in the old law the name of a Cabinet officer—that of the Secretary of Agriculture—I would not make a point of order against that Department. That was in this title, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, where the Executive Departments are enumerated in the preceding section, and the decision has been "one presided over by a Cabinet officer." Now, what is the other section, page 27, section 160, for the benefit of the Committee on Appropriations?

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers and assistant messengers, copyists, laborers, and other employees at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

There are the great branches of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. Just a moment, with the indulgence of the House, because part of my time was taken up by interruptions.

Now, there is ample provision under the law. Decision after decision has been made along that line, and why is a great deal of criticism inveighed against men in the House because they are asking that the rules of the House be observed, and because they believe as well that there are many provisions in this bill that have heretofore been objected to that ought to have been objected to on broader grounds?

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it not the object of this bill to reduce the salaries of the underpaid clerks and to increase the salaries of the higher-priced clerks and the favored ones from beginning to end?

Mr. PRINCE. Well, I would rather have the chairman of the committee answer that, and I will give him time for that purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the statement of the gentleman?

Mr. HAUGEN. I asked the question, Is it not the object of this bill to reduce the salary of every underpaid clerk and to increase the salary of the higher-priced clerk, the favored ones, from beginning to end?

Mr. TAWNEY. What clerks does the gentleman refer to? The clerks in the Departments?

Mr. HAUGEN. From beginning to end. You fix the salaries of the messengers now. They are fixed at $1,100. These men are here on duty about four or five months in the year, while you have others here who have to face the storm night and day and who perform their services for twelve months, and they are reduced in pay.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was done by action of the House, fixing the salaries at $1,100.

Mr. LITTAUER. Are you willing to take the position that these salaries are not properly fixed in the amount?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly; that is known to all men of experience.

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you say that they are not equal to those paid throughout the United States?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman is surely mistaken in his contention. They are paid 50 per cent more than the men in your own home.

Mr. HAUGEN. What are they paid here in the city, if you please? You now propose to pay them $1,020. You propose to pay the messengers $1,100, who report here for three or four months in the year. These men are here every day, not including Sundays. They work over eight hours a day without a single day of leave of absence, except the fifty-two days, and these people, who are not required to go into the highways, are now to receive $80 a year more than those who are out day and night.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. I want to get an answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be recognized for further time.

Mr. PRINCE. The main contention, as I gather, is this: The gentlemen in charge of the bill charge that we are invoking the rule when we ought not to invoke the rule. What are the rules for? If it should appear to the country that here is a great body of 386 Members who have rules that they can not do business under, it may be suggested in the country that the rules ought to be modified in a way so that the expressions of the American people through their representatives can have a voice upon the floor of this House. [Applause.]

And I trust and hope that, aside from the discussion of this bill, it will rivet the attention of the country upon the rules of this House. Tell us what they can do, and what they can not do. And in the coming Congress, which, in my judgment, will be overwhelmingly Republican, we will adjust the rules in a way that things will be carried on and policies carried out in accordance with the wishes of the people; and as one of their representatives I am perfectly willing to stand before my people, as I expect to this fall, and give an account of what I am doing here on the floor of the House to-day. I have no question what the result will be. Now, if you want to bring in a proposition here which will make these various propositions in order, bring it in and let us vote on it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before the Clerk proceeds I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois one question. He has stood here upon the floor of this House and said that what he is doing here is in deference to the rules of the House; and now, as he is expressing such a high regard for the rules of the House, I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that he received the appointment of a janitor under a rule of this House a short time ago?

Mr. PRINCE. I did.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman if that janitor was not assigned to service for two committee rooms in this House?

Mr. PRINCE. Three.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is that janitor here in accordance with the rules of the House——

Mr. PRINCE. No.

Mr. TAWNEY. Or is he drawing his salary at home?

Mr. PRINCE. I will answer the gentleman's question frankly. I am chairman of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River. A resolution was introduced by me asking for the appointment of a janitor. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts. An omnibus resolution came out of the Committee on Accounts, assigning to me the privilege of naming a janitor for the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, that janitor to do the work of the index committee room and of the room of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. I wrote a letter at once, when I had the privilege to make the appointment, to a constituent of mine living in Galva, Henry County, Ill., named C. A. Bradford, asking him to come here and take that position. He came here, appeared before the proper person, and took the oath of office to enter upon the discharge of his duty. He entered upon the discharge of his duty. He took sick. I called at his room here and found him, as I supposed, almost dying. It was a question in my mind whether to send him to a hospital or to send him by sleeping car to his home. I thought it was better to do the latter. He is at home recovering from his sickness. I have a letter in my pocket, just received only day before yesterday, stating that he hopes he will be here in a little while. In the meantime I went before the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, told him the condition of my sick white man from my district, asked him to name a person to do the service, and told him I would be personally responsible for the payment for the janitor's services until he was well enough to return.

I went to the index office and made a similar request. The clerk of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is Mr. Gibbs. He employed a man and paid out the money, and I asked him how much it was, and he told me, and I paid it.

Mr. LITTAUER. What is the sum that is being paid for the care of this room?

Mr. PRINCE. Two dollars and a half, as I recollect.

Mr. LITTAUER. A month?

Mr. PRINCE. Two dollars and a half a month for the work in the room of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. LITTAUER. How much in the index room?

Mr. PRINCE. Three dollars a month.

Mr. LITTAUER. And what for the services of the janitor work in the room of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River?

Mr. PRINCE. That, I suppose, will be in the neighborhood of $3.

Mr. LITTAUER. So that the total amount paid is $8 per month, paid to a man to do the work of another man, to whom the Government pays $60 a month.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; that is true, but the man is now sick at home.

He was here to do the work, but he took suddenly sick, and you and I are liable to be sick. I brought the man in good faith from my district. That man took the oath here in Washington, D. C., and entered upon the discharge of his duty. He is sick at home, through no fault of mine nor of his. Do you fault me for that, my colleague?

Mr. LITTAUER. I certainly do, for you are responsible for the appointment of this man, who receives $60 a month for his services from the Treasury of the United States. You brought him here. How long was he here?

Mr. PRINCE. He was here perhaps a week or more, but took sick suddenly.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then he went home and remained there, but continues to draw the $60 a month. Instead of providing proper services for the care of these rooms, as the law allows you to control the work, you arrange for that work at a compensation of $8 per month, a difference of $52 per month.

Mr. PRINCE. I told the chairman of the committee to employ any man he saw fit and bring in a bill and I would see that it was paid. I got a receipt running to the janitor, and that receipt was given by the different men in charge of the room, and that receipt has been returned to the janitor, and not one cent kept by me. It has all gone back to him, and that man will be here in the discharge of his duty. Go and ask Mr. GILLETT, the chairman of the committee, and ask him if his room has not been well taken care of. If not, I will hire another one. Go and ask the man in charge of the index room; if that room has not been well taken care of, I will hire another one. Here is a sick man that you are trying to put me on the grill about.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. BATES. Is the gentleman bearing in mind the fact that the resolution that authorized the employment of this janitor empowers him to perform the duties of messenger as well as janitor? Is the eight-dollar man performing any duty as messenger?

Mr. PRINCE. As to that I do not think he would have to do any in the index room. As to the other room, I don't know.

Mr. BATES. It is the common duty of the janitors to spend a portion of the time in running errands.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; and the man will be here to do it. I am perfectly willing for the country to know the whole facts. If I had left the man at home and was drawing $60 for him I would hide my head in shame before my colleagues and the country, but when I brought a man from my district—a white man—who took an oath, entered upon the discharge of his duty, a supporter of mine, who is taken suddenly sick and has to go home to be doctored, I think it is scarcely fair for gentlemen to charge me with violating the rules of the House when I am living up to the rules of this House. If it is a violation, I will meet my constituents and the country. [Applause.]

Have the gentlemen of the committee anything else to hurl at me because I see fit to insist on the rules of the House not being violated as against your Appropriations Committee in this House?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; we think the gentleman's own comment is enough, and also the comment contained in his statement that the Committee on Appropriations is padding the rolls of this House.

Mr. PRINCE. The Committee on Accounts passed a resolution allowing me, as a chairman, to appoint this janitor; brought it into the House; it was voted upon in open session by this House under the rules of the House. It was not smuggled in, as the committee is trying to do through this appropriation bill, violating the rules of the House, with items that are subject to points of order and which are going out on points of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I listened a while ago to a speech by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the rules of the House. I served at one time on the Appropriations Committee, and I certainly have a kindly feeling for the committee, and I am sure in violating the rules of the House the general Appropriations Committee of this House have often passed meritorious, economic, and good legislation.

I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that the law that was written on the statute book in the last session of Congress which prohibited Department officers from creating deficiencies was a good law, an economic remedy; but notwithstanding that it is a fact that this committee has written good law on the statute book in violation of the rules of this House, I do not think it lies within the mouth of the great Committee on Appropriations, or any other committee, to come into the House of Representatives and attempt to justify themselves in the violation of the rules of the House. We all violate the rules of the House every now and then, and ask unanimous consent to do so, but when we do it it ought to be understood that we do it with the unanimous consent of every Member of this House.

Mr. Chairman, the object of the rules of this House is not simply to prevent the House of Representatives from being an unorganized mob of men. The object of the rules of this House more than anything else is to protect the rights of every individual man upon the floor of the House, and more than all, Mr. Chairman, the object of our having a set of rules in this House is to protect the rights of the minority of this House. It is to see that the minority here has justice, and to regulate the majority so that they shall not trample on the rights of the minority and the rights of the individual Members of this House.

I therefore say that no man has the right to complain that an objection is being made to what he is doing if his course of action is beyond and outside of the rules of the House. Now, the gentleman said that we could not legislate. A great deal of legislation that goes on appropriation bills belongs to other committees in this House. If the Appropriations Committee of this House did not legislate in appropriation bills that legislation would be enacted after coming from other committees in the House; and if it came from other committees it often would receive a more careful consideration, and a better consideration, than when it comes in here to be enacted on an appropriation bill.

I do not think there is any rule in this House that is wiser, that is better, that is safer for the good government of this House, than Rule XXI, which prohibits the enactment of new legislation on appropriation bills, and I think the Members of the House will recognize that fact when they realize that if you put new legislation on an appropriation bill and bring it into this House you go into the Committee of the Whole, you have no chance to call the roll, you have no chance to put the membership of this House on a record vote on that direct question. If you allow this to be done, to enact new legislation on a general appropriation bill, you can put law through this House without complying with the constitutional requirement that one-fifth of the membership of this House shall be entitled to have a record vote, because you can only have the record vote on the adoption of the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to express my entire approval of the action of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in sitting here day after day and insisting that the rules shall be observed. I say this because the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], the chairman of this great committee, in quite a long and severe speech attempted to develop sentiment in this House against those two gentlemen for doing their duty, and also attempted to arouse public sentiment throughout the country against them if possible, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] attempted to impute to one of them an improper motive by reference to a janitorship. Now, these gentlemen, who are running this great committee, are sticking for rules when they want to accomplish their purposes by the rules; but when they bring in new proposed legislation which they know is not proper they are disposed to bulldoze or browbeat other men who are here insisting that the rules be observed. [Laughter and applause.] If a rule is a good rule, it ought to be kept. If it is a bad rule, it ought to be revoked. And the only way, certainly the best way, to determine whether a rule is a good rule or a bad rule is to enforce it. That is what these gentlemen are doing. If it is a bad rule, improve it, correct it, or repeal it, and if it is a good rule, carry it out to the letter. Do not attempt to threaten, terrorize, or ridicule other Members who insist that you shall conduct this piece of legislation in an orderly and legal manner and according to the well-recognized rules of this body.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I don't know whether it would be proper to allow these paragraphs to pass without some observations from one of the Members from Iowa. For some unaccountable reasons my venerable friend on my right, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], although he is fully equipped for making a speech—you will observe that he is decorated with flowers and is wearing a Prince Albert coat—has flown the coop. [Laughter.] And he seems unwilling to make his annual contribution to the civil-service reform subject. I confess that for myself I propose to change somewhat my lines. I have heretofore, in a feeble way, tried to express my condemnation of the new-fangled civil service that we now are agonizing under, and it is true I have heretofore found but little in the performance of either Commissioners or their subordinates or in the operation of the system itself that challenges my commendation. But, looking over some of the older statutes, I have discovered something that I can say in commendation of the civil service. This is a great country of ours, Mr. Chairman. Expansion is the rule. Growth and progress mark every footstep of the Republic's course. We are getting to be a great people, and all of our institutions to be harmonious with the general purposes of the Republic must be great; they must be growing. I find that twenty-three years ago the first appropriation that was made to carry on the expense of that new departure of ours, devoted to civil-service reform, aggregated $20,000. Ten persons or less were provided for by that expenditure. The second appropriation was about the same amount, and the same number of people. I find that this appropriation bill, only twenty-three years after those that I have spoken of, carries $237,000 and provides for one hundred and eighty-odd people. Think of the wonderful growth of this institution! One thousand eight hundred per cent in its personality; 1,100 per cent in its expenditure! It is keeping pace with the wonderful progress of the Republic. [Applause and laughter.] Ah, Mr. Chairman, it is outstripping all that we have ever done in any other of the avenues of growth or in any of the evidences of prosperity that we are able to furnish to a wondering world. We boast about the growth of our foreign commerce. It is a bagatelle in its percentage with the growth of this institution. We boast about the wonderful production of wealth that this nation is capable of in a single year. Twenty-one billions is the record for last year, and yet if you compare that with what we were able to do in this institution since it was an infant, how small is the growth in production in its percentage. And so it is with everything else. The civil service is outstripping all the other evidences of prosperity and growth in this country, and therefore I am able to commend it in showing that in twenty-three years it has increased the number of those that are able to carry it on at the ratio of 1,800 per cent and in the cost to the people a percentage nearly as great. Wonderful is the civil-service reform of the country! [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Rural carrier examining board: For one chief of division, $2,000.

Mr. PRINCE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PRINCE. To make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. Beginning at lines 7 and 8, on page 35, I make the point of order to the provision "for one chief of division, $2,000." That is new legislation, and it is in contravention of the second paragraph of Rule XXI of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would just like to call the attention of the House, however, to the fact that this provision takes the place of a man now employed at $2,250, so that the economy achieved is on the wrong side of the ledger, amounting to $250 in this instance.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I wish to say that the old law shows that the amount expended for this purpose was $20,690.14, and this economical bill that reduces it carries in it $23,440—an addition, not a subtraction.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman is not well advised, for the appropriation for the rural carrier examining board last year was $25,690 and this bill carries $23,440, making a reduction of $2,250.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentlemen are not speaking to anything before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For the purpose of moving to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of this bill there has apparently arisen something of bitterness as between Members of the House sitting in the committee which, it seems to me, we might well avoid, if possible. The growth of appropriations for the support of the Federal Government has been so great that under the most favorable circumstances it is almost impossible for the House to consider properly the separate items of expenditure. Hampered as we are by the difficulties incident to the appropriation of money for the public service, we ought, at least so far as possible, to approach the consideration of these questions free from excitement and free from anger. I do not mean by this remark to criticise at all the gentlemen who have seen fit to raise points of order during the consideration of this bill. I was myself engaged in a greater or less degree in presenting points of order during the consideration of the Army bill. Some of my colleagues upon the Appropriations Committee were also engaged in that, and I am not here to criticise in others those things I practice myself. Of course, there has sometimes arisen the question as to whether the points of order made against this bill are in memory of the points of order made against the Army bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman is not speaking to anything before the House.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am speaking to an amendment under the invariable practice of the House which I had a right to propose. The question has arisen in my mind whether the fate that overtook the bill to abolish the grade of Lieutenant-General in the Army may have had anything to do with arousing the feeling that is displayed now upon the floor of this House, but whatever may have been the provocation upon our part and whatever may have been the direct cause that induced our distinguished friends to raise these points of order, I am not seeking to criticise them nor in any sense to rebuke them. I assume no right or authority to rebuke them, but it does seem to me that misapprehension exists here as to the purposes of the rules of the House. The rules of the House are not like the criminal laws of the land. The criminal laws of the land should be enforced or repealed, but the rules of the House contemplate their being set aside by numerous methods. We set apart special days on which to suspend the rules and for the time being set them aside. We pass more measures here by unanimous consent, perhaps, than by all other methods combined, and not in accordance with the rules—the bills not being entitled to consideration under the rules.

Mr. PRINCE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, most certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. You say we pass many bills by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do.

Mr. PRINCE. Is it not the invariable rule of the Speaker of the House when, for instance, the gentleman from Iowa rises and asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, that the bill is sent to the Clerk's desk and read, and the Speaker asks if there is objection, and pauses for an objection?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman is certainly correct as to the practice of the House.

Mr. PRINCE. And unanimous consent can be objected to if we desire to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am simply seeking to point out, Mr. Chairman, that while we have rules that we are entitled to insist upon, they are not, under the practice of the House, insisted upon in season and out of season as though they were statutes, but that most of the legislation of the House is done either by motion to suspend the rules or by unanimous consent, and bills are taken up which could not come up under the rules, save by unanimous consent. So that most of our legislation is legislation enacted not in obedience to the rules laid down, but by either unanimous or through two-thirds approval by a departure from the ordinary rules. So it has been the practice from the early time to make such changes on appropriation bills as are made upon the bill now before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That does not deny to anyone the right to raise a point of order or object, and what I am seeking to get at is this: That the rules are made that they may be insisted upon by any Member, in the exercise of his best judgment, for the advancement of good legislation, but that the objection ought not to be raised unless the proposed matter is objectionable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say this to those who have objected: That it is their strict legal right; but if a meritorious measure is brought in here to reduce expenditures, that it is not a wise time, in my judgment, that they should seek to control the judgment of others by insisting upon a rigid enforcement of the rules. These rules are not enforced as to the greater number of bills that pass the House. Here is a proposition to reduce public expenditures. It is a laudable enterprise; a commendable effort; and yet these rules that strike down alike meritorious propositions and those lacking in merit are cited for the purpose of preventing the reduction of public expenditures. No criticism will be heard from me upon my distinguished friend from Illinois. Between us there have always existed most pleasant personal relations, and I trust they will always so continue. But I ask the question here: Passing over, free from anger and free from offense, whatever may have been given by any man in the past, should these rules be resorted to for the purpose of preventing a reduction in public expenditures? If we are to come here to discharge our duty dispassionately to the whole country, we should insist upon the rules when their violation would be detrimental to the public service, and waive these rules whenever we can thereby promote the public welfare. So I hope that whether the offense originally emanated from one side or the other in this matter, that the rules will be enforced whenever asserted, as they will be by the Chair; but that no Member will feel that it is his duty to raise a point of order against any portion of any bill when the enactment of that provision would be beneficial to the public welfare.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think the rule that he is speaking in favor of, that should actuate Members not on the committee, ought to also actuate the Members on the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think they ought to consider amendments offered in good faith by Members not on their committee with regard to whether the amendment is for a good purpose or not, and not simply make the point of order, irrespective of the merits of the proposition?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer that question with great pleasure. The committee, at least the subcommittee, has given a most patient and careful investigation to the items of this bill. It could have given no consideration to an amendment here proposed from the floor. An amendment, therefore, proposed by the committee after full consideration should not, in my judgment, be put upon an equality with a proposition made on the floor that had never been submitted to the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is something in that; but does not the gentleman realize the practice of the committees having in charge these various appropriation bills has been to make the point of order universally, without regard to the matter, whether wise or unwise; and is not the gentleman now in a rather peculiar position when he appeals to the House to accept the wisdom of the committee, that never has accepted the wisdom of the Members of the House?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not agree that it has been the practice universally to raise the point of order, but the general practice has arisen because the great body of amendments offered from the floor have not been considered by the committee; and it is a matter of common knowledge that wise and orderly legislation ordinarily can not be prepared here upon the floor of the House, but ought to be prepared in the committee room.

I am simply appealing, wherever the fault may have originated, to gentlemen to lay aside every particle of feeling at least upon this subject. If gentlemen see fit to continue to make points of order it shall arouse no bitterness on my part. That is their right. But I appeal to them that the point of order ought not to be made if, upon full consideration of the proposition the committee has made, it is found public expenditures can be reduced by changing the law and the committee has so reported to the House. With that, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, in case a Member of this House has what he believes to be a meritorious amendment that he wishes to propose to one of these appropriation bills, what chance has he to have a hearing before the membership of this House on the proposition if under the rules he may be cut off by some member of the committee making the point of order that it is new legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would answer that if any Member of this House has an amendment which he thinks important to have added it would be better for him to present it to the proper committee and attempt to get it incorporated in the bill with the consent of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; but suppose he has failed in the committee and he wants to be heard on the floor? How can he hope to be heard under the rules which forbid a Member from offering a new proposition?

Mr. LITTAUER. On his request to reserve the point of order, which has always been granted by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTAUER. But it has always been granted by the committee at least.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But he never gets a vote on it. It is simply reserved, so that he can say something for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the membership does not vote on it at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If I may be permitted to answer the gentleman, if the committee has upon consideration rejected his amendments, of course the committee, having fully considered the matter, would be opposed to its being put in upon the floor of the House, where it could not be considered in its due relation to other parts of the bill. I am not criticising anyone, and I want that understood.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am simply making an appeal that, where a provision is for the good of the public service, Members should not object to that any more than they invoke the rule against every meritorious bill for which unanimous consent is asked, or any more than they insist upon the rules against a bill when a motion is made to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. My criticism is that the committee takes to itself the exclusive privilege of passing upon the question whether a proposition is meritorious or not. A Member of this House is entitled to have a hearing before the membership of this House upon a proposition that he thinks is meritorious.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think the distinguished committee of which I happen to be a member should beseech Members of this House not to insist upon the enforcement of its rules. I do not believe that either the committee or its members are possessed of any superior wisdom or virtue above that possessed by other Members of the House.

In the investigations connected with the preparation of this bill certain conditions were disclosed which, in the opinion of the committee, should be remedied, and in order to correct abuses that exist, or to call the attention of the House to the abuses, certain provisions have been inserted in this bill which, if adopted, would in some instances benefit the service and in other instances, in my judgment, would not benefit the service. I am under some obligation to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], because, apparently, they are going to save me some trouble later on of interjecting points of order to some provisions in the bill. But the members of the committee should not object or be chagrined if Members insist upon their rights. The committee does its work and performs its duty when it presents to the House a view of the abuses that exist. In doing that the committee is compelled to violate the rules of the House, because, as I wish to call attention, the rule expressly provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill * * * for any expenditure not being authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations—

And so forth. Now, in these rules, which have been named after the great parliamentary leader of the Republican party, Mr. Reed, there is one provision—and it is the only time, I believe, that the Republicans of this country have paid a tribute to that great genius, Thomas Jefferson—in which they not only approve of certain of his writings, but adopt the rules framed by him as the rules of procedure in this House. One of the rules of the House provides that—

> The rules of parliamentary practice comprised in Jefferson's Manual shall govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable and in which they are not inconsistent with the existing rules and orders of the House and the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives.

In the first section of Jefferson's Manual, which is printed under an order of the House for the information and guidance of the Members in the conduct of their business, Mr. Jefferson quotes Mr. Onslow, one of the oldest Speakers of the House of Commons, in this language:

> Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say, "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power."

And then Mr. Jefferson continues:

> So far the maxim is certainly true, and is founded in good sense, that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House; by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities. (2 Hats., 171, 172.)
> And whether these forms be in all cases the most rational or not is really not of so great importance. It is much more material that there should be a rule to go by than what that rule is; that there may be a uniformity of proceeding in business not subject to the caprice of the Speaker or captiousness of the members. It is very material that order, decency, and regularity be preserved in a dignified public body. (2 Hats., 149.)

Now, the rule which forbids the items complained of on this bill originated as far back as 1837, when it was found imperative to protect the House against itself and to prevent the enactment of vicious legislation upon the great supply bills necessary for the support of the Government. It may be that some change should be made in the rules of the House. It has often been asserted that a change should be made in these rules. My colleague from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] suggests that the committee has fully investigated these matters and that the Members of the House should be largely guided by their judgment. There is another body which has some jurisdiction of matters of Federal legislation which has another set of rules, and one rule in force in that body might perhaps properly be adopted by this body, and that is that after a committee having jurisdiction of certain matters reports favorably upon those matters to the House it would then be in order to incorporate such matters upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rules of the House were adopted in a manner that prevented any Member of the House attempting to effectuate a change. As soon as the House was organized a motion was made that the rules be adopted which were in force in a previous Congress, the previous question was demanded and ordered, and no Member of the House practically had any voice whatever in the make-up of the rules under which the House operates.

So that when some Member of the House now insists on exercising the rights that are conferred upon him under those rules, it comes with poor grace from those who have shackled the House with the rules to complain of their enforcement.

It may be—and I have no doubt it is the fact—that some of the points of order that have been interjected during the course of this bill have prevented reforms and economies, but the House must realize that in giving gentlemen the power to prevent the consideration of legislation the House itself is responsible for that action and not the gentlemen who undertake to exercise their rights.

Even, Mr. Chairman, though a member of the committee reporting the bill should rise to interpose a point of order, gentlemen are inclined to seriously criticise him for that action. I am not at all in sympathy with that prevalent feeling in this House, that committees are so impeccable, that they are so virtuous, that they are so wise, that when they have determined by a majority vote that certain things should be reported to the House it is high treason for any Member to exercise his right under the rules to prevent, if he desires, the consideration of those matters in violation of the rule. [Applause.]

I am not going to criticise my own committee. I believe that the committee has done its full duty in calling the attention of the House to abuses that exist, and I am indifferent to what happens to any provision in this bill. I will vote for each provision or against it, as my judgment dictates that I should. I am perfectly willing that every other Member of this House shall exercise freely all the rights that he has under the rules in the consideration of this bill, and let each Member do as the committee is compelled to do, assume the responsibility for his own action. When that is done, Mr. Chairman, if it prevents reforms being made on this bill, it may result in vitalizing some of the dead committees of the House. It may result in effecting a reform by accomplishing it through the proper machinery of the House, and there may no longer be the spectacle of seventeen or eighteen committees organized for the purpose of working, but existing merely to give places of refuge to the gentlemen fortunate enough to be appointed as chairmen of these committees.

So I would say to my colleagues on the committee, in the best of good nature, whatever be the course followed by these gentlemen or any other gentlemen, and whatever may be the fate of any provision in the bill, that we rest content in the knowledge that we have performed our duty, and satisfied that everybody else is endeavoring to perform his according to his best judgment and according to his rights.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that they have gotten into a difficulty here that could be very easily and peacefully and properly settled. Why does not this committee rise and report to the House their inability to handle an appropriation bill, refer it to the Committee on Territories of this House, get a rule passed by the Speaker and pass this bill, and don't let anybody read it? [Laughter.] What is the use of talking about it and wasting time in this way? Two millions of people can be disposed of in twenty minutes' debate, and here you are quibbling over what a clerk gets in some Department. I am ashamed to see my friends forgetting how to attend to public business. [Laughter.] They have got no business to consider this bill, anyway. It has come to a point in the consideration of public business in this House that consideration of a bill is folly. Why, you can not even send it over to the Senate in a shape to suit you. This skeleton is going over there, and the gentlemen who have been trying so hard to maintain the dignity of this body will be crawling on their stomachs to the Senate to get these items put back in the bill. Abuse it with the lips and serve it with your hearts every minute when you want something done. [Applause.] That is what will become of this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. How does the gentleman get such assurance?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have seen it for twenty years.

Mr. LITTAUER. You may not see it again.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope I never may; but I am glad of one thing. I want to see these rules enforced. My long service here would permit me, with even my known modesty, to suggest to my own side of the House that these rules are so good that if I had my way, speaking for myself, we would not step an inch out of their divine and sacred presence from now until this Congress closed. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman if he were to pursue that course whether he might not lose a public building some place in his district?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, it is possible that I might lose a postmaster at Bull Gulch or Frog City, or some beautiful city like that. I might not get a postmaster that I particularly wanted, but I would forego even that to see these rules worked out fairly, honestly, and correctly. Gentlemen, let us try. Let us see about your "unanimous consents." They passed my statehood bill by unanimous consent. [Laughter.] Absolutely unanimous consent! Of course we could kick, but that was all. One man unanimously brings in the bill, and one man whips in the balance, and the bill is passed. Why don't we do the appropriation bills in that way? The Senate will consider them, give due and reasonable time, and give them fair and proper consideration; and I would to God if this thing keeps up that the whole legislative business were put in the hands of men who at least with reason and common sense and fair debate would look at the matters that so closely concern the interests of the people of this country. Pass everything here as you passed the statehood bill, or else pass them under a fair and open debate, where one man on the floor would have as much right as any other to the expression of his opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to take any of the time of the committee, because I think this bill would have made much more progress if there had been less debate upon the method of procedure of some of the gentlemen in the House. Now, the House is amply able to take care of itself, even without the aid of the Delegate from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and to pass such legislation as the majority of the House shall deem best to have passed and to defeat such legislation as the majority shall deem best to defeat. Of course, it is in the province of any Member of the House in Committee of the Whole to raise a point of order, and if the point of order is well taken the Chairman will promptly rule. These rules are in the interest of economy, so far as they relate to appropriation bills, in order that the Committee on Appropriations or anyone else shall not come in here and create new offices unless it is considered by the appropriate committee, the committee having that legislation in charge. They are purposely framed so that any Member can defeat any such attempt on the part of the Committee on Appropriations by raising the point of order, and it does not disturb me in the least to see two gentlemen sitting here and raising points of order. It has generally been the custom of the House, Mr. Chairman, in such cases, for a gentleman to reserve the point of order on a provision in the bill which he thought was out of order and which he could not see the merit of until the item was explained, and if it was explained satisfactorily to him, to waive the point of order and let it go in the bill; but gentlemen have the right to insist upon the point of order. Now, I hope they will insist to their hearts' content, and I hope that when similar points of order are raised upon these items which must go out, that the matter will be left speedily to the Chair to rule upon and to rule whether they are in order or not, and with less debate upon each proposition we can get through with the consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole, each Member finding out what he thinks ought to be in and what he thinks ought to be out. Afterwards the House can very easily pass the bill, and pass such a bill as the majority of the House is in favor of, and no two Members or any number of Members less than a majority of the House can prevent it; we can do it with fair consideration, and we can send a bill over to the Senate which does not need to be deliberated upon by making a speech, when three or four Members are present, of three or four hours in length; we can have here when necessary the five-minute debate, when the Members can be brought into contact with all the reasons for or against a single item in the bill, and we can proceed in an orderly manner.

Gentlemen declaim against the rules of the House and they want a sort of town meeting, where every one of 386 Members, clamoring for recognition of the Speaker, shall each receive recognition at the same time to make his motion or to make his speech. They want pandemonium. The rules of the House, the Speaker, are not the result of any one man's work. They are the result of the experience of many more years than most of us have ever seen either in the House or out of it. They are the result of the best thought of the best men who have adorned the halls of Congress in the past on both sides of the House. They were made for the protection of the minority as well as for the advantage of the majority in having its will preferably in this House. And no such exhibition as has been made here to-day and no such declarations as we have just heard from the gentleman from Arizona will change the rules of the House. The rules of the House will remain after we have left it and they will remain substantially as they are to-day, and the House will transact its business under these rules in an orderly and proper manner. I want to say that gentlemen who are opposing this bill will finally see the bill pass in the shape that the majority of the House desire it passed and it will go over to the Senate, and they will perform their functions upon it by way of amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the Commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $8,500.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to get some information from the Committee on Appropriations. I see in the Book of Estimates the Civil Service Commission have asked for $4,500 for the rent of a building. This bill does not carry that item, and I wish to inquire what bill does carry it.

Mr. LITTAUER. It will be found in this bill, under the Interior Department.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, if it is found in this bill, I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Has the gentleman's committee made any investigation as to the rent of buildings used by the Government as compared with the value of those buildings?

Mr. LITTAUER. We did it quite thoroughly. In fact, the matter became of such importance that two members of the committee were requested to visit the various different buildings and endeavor to find whether the rentals paid were fair and equitable in order that we might recommend them or not in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I suppose that——

Mr. LITTAUER. This very building to which the gentleman refers was at one time paid for by the Government at the rate of $8,000, but for another purpose, however.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not questioning that particular building or, indeed, any other building, but what I want is to know whether or not the rentals of the various buildings in this District are reasonable and anywhere in the neighborhood of what private individuals would pay for the same property.

Mr. LITTAUER. We believed so, with all the information we had before us.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, if it is true that the rents the Government is now paying for the various buildings in the District of Columbia are reasonable rentals, the sooner this House passes bills to erect its own buildings the better for the Government.

Mr. LITTAUER. Your committee came to that conclusion long since.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; Assistant Secretary, $4,500; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $4,500 each; chief clerk, $3,000; Assistant Solicitor of the Department of State, to be appointed by the Secretary of State, $3,000; law clerk, and assistant, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary of State, to edit the laws of Congress and perform such other duties as may be required of them, at $2,500 and $1,500, respectively; eight chiefs of bureaus, at $2,100 each; two translators, at $2,100 each; additional to chief of bureau of accounts as disbursing clerk, $200; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary of State, $2,250; thirteen clerks of class 4; nine clerks of class 3; nineteen clerks of class 2; thirty-two clerks of class 1, one of whom is to be a telegraph operator; seven clerks, at $1,000 each; fifteen clerks, at $900 each; chief messenger, $1,000; three messengers; twenty-two assistant messengers; messenger boy, $420; packer, $720; four laborers, at $600 each; one telephone switch-board operator; in all, $204,370: Provided, That hereafter there shall not be employed in the Department of State or in connection with said Department in the District of Columbia any personal services other than those which shall be specifically authorized or appropriated for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. To make several points of order. In lines 19 and 20, page 36——

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will please speak a little louder.

Mr. HARDWICK. I see in lines 19 and 20, page 36, the office of clerk to the Secretary of State is provided in this bill. Now, there is a section of the Revised Statutes, read by the Chair a moment ago, which reads as follows:

Each head of a Department is authorized to employ such number——

Mr. LITTAUER. I will agree that the point of order lies.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. The next point of order is, on page 37, line 4, "one telephone switch-board operator." I make the same point of order on that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say, in connection with the point of order, that we have also in this bill provided for telephone switch-board operators, fixing a uniform salary for all of them and reducing their salary in nearly every case—not in every case, but in some cases where they are now getting a salary of $1,200 a year we reduce it to $720. If the gentleman now takes this out on a point of order it will necessitate the restoration of the old salaries, ranging all the way from $600 to $1,200 a year for identically the same service we have provided for at an annual compensation of $720. I want that explanation to go in connection with the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, instead of the thing being as the gentleman has stated it——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am replying to the gentleman. I make the express point of order that this is a new office that has been created. If this is not additional office, then I do not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia that this is not a new office. In the former bill they are designated "telephone operators" and here they are called "switch-board operators." Their salaries have been made uniform at $60 a month, as the chairman has just stated, ranging all the way from $1,200 down to $600, and this makes them not to exceed $720.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an appropriation for a telephone-switchboard operator in the Department of State, which is an Executive Department. Section 169 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

A telephone-switchboard operator may fairly be classed as a sort of laborer—skilled laborer—within the spirit and intendment of the statute.

The Chair is of opinion that this case is covered and the appropriation authorized by section 169, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to move to strike out the last word of the section, for the purpose of asking the committee a question for information, because I am unable to ascertain what the committee means by the proviso that is added at the close of this section, in which it is said "there shall not be employed in the Department any personal services." What does that mean? It certainly is not English. If the gentleman can tell me what is meant by prohibiting the employment of personal services I would be glad. I do not think we ought to pass bills that are meaningless.

Mr. LITTAUER. The intent of this proviso is to prevent clerical services being employed in the Department of State and paid for out of appropriations not specifically authorized for clerical services. We found this condition, that a number of clerks—twenty-five, I believe, in all—were being employed by the Department and paid for out of an appropriation for emergencies arising in the diplomatic service.

Mr. PERKINS. If that is the intent of the committee, it certainly has been very unfortunate in the choice of the language it employs, because I submit with confidence that it means nothing.

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe the same terms are continually used in appropriation bills. I hardly think anyone would have any doubt as to what the meaning is.

Mr. PERKINS. To prevent the employment of personal service—I do not know whether it may be appropriation-bill English, but it certainly is no other sort of English.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question, if I can get his attention.

What is meant in here by these clerks of class 1, 2, 3, and 4? That has probably been explained; the older Members probably understand what these designations mean, but I would be obliged if he would indicate what they are.

Mr. LITTAUER. Clerks of class 4 receive a compensation of $1,800.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Clerks of class 4 get $1,800?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes. The clerks of class 3 get $1,600, the clerks of class 2 get $1,400, and the clerks of class 1 get $1,200. Their compensation is fixed by statute.

Mr. BURLESON. And other classes run down to $720.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $4,500 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,500; stenographer, $1,800; three private secretaries, one to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $2,250; one clerk of class 4; two clerks of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, $1,000; four messengers; three assistant messengers, and one laborer; in all, $46,430.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to know of the chairman of the committee if the periodical clerk, if he can be called by that name, is included in the paragraph just read?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not understand what you mean by "periodical clerk." Do you mean the clerk who makes clippings?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I notice in the hearings that it was stated they had a man up there getting a salary of $1,800 a year, with one assistant. I do not know whether he had a bookkeeper and a messenger and a janitor or not, but he had some help, and his business, according to the testimony, was to read the newspapers and clip such things as he thought would be interesting to somebody else and send them up to him.

Mr. LITTAUER. The Secretary of the Treasury does use two clerks, as we are advised, for such purposes, and finds it necessary, in order to keep current with matters connected with his Department.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to know the designation of that clerk, and I would like to know in what paragraph he is provided for. He ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LITTAUER. As far as we were advised, we were told that one such clerk is in class 4, and the other was a messenger.

Mr. JOHNSON. A clerk in class 4 would be a clerk at $1,800. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out from the paragraph just read one of the clerks in class 4. I do not know how many are provided for, but I move to make the number one less.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is in the Secretary's office. You do not want to take it out of this item, do you?

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out one of those clerks in class 4.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the line and page where he desires to amend?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, the trouble is that I do not know. But I move to strike out one clerk of class 4, in line 7, page 38.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman's purpose, then, is to strike out these two clerks that we have referred to?

Mr. JOHNSON. My purpose is to strike out the periodical clerk.

Mr. LITTAUER. But does not the gentleman realize that there are in this bill, in the clerical service in connection with the Treasury Department, 3,371 individuals, and that if you strike out this clerk, under the system of detail the Secretary will have the right to appoint another clerk of class 4 whom he may choose, or another messenger, for this service?

Mr. JOHNSON. Well——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina insist on his amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: I have examined this testimony with a great deal of care. I know that this is a great Government and that it needs a great force to carry it on, but I do not believe there is or can be any necessity for any Department of this Government employing at the public expense men to read and clip the newspapers for the benefit of some official. Every other Secretary and Assistant Secretary and every Member of the Senate and House of Representatives might, with equal reason, come here and ask for the same thing. This is a country of newspapers and periodicals. No man can read them all, but every intelligent man is expected to read the current news of the day, and any man who is capable of presiding over one of the great Departments of this Government can read such newspapers as he ought to read.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does not the gentleman realize that these men are presumably employed in work that ought to be carried on? The Treasury Department has its officers throughout every State in the Union. It must keep current information regarding whatever may transpire in the customs service, in the internal-revenue service, in connection with the mints and assay offices, and other matters of that character.

It may be true that some other purposes are added to these, but it would seem almost indispensable that the head of one of our great Departments, with his many duties, should be advised of matters appertaining to his Department that appear in the press throughout the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from New York, let me say that that is not the purpose of this clerk, to gather from the newspapers what may be taking place in the customs service; but the testimony is that he examines the daily papers for political editorials and all such things as that.

Mr. LITTAUER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Can he point to that in the testimony?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. LITTAUER. I can point to a statement here made by the chief clerk of the Treasury Department where he says:

> They read the newspapers and make clippings that are of interest to the Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries and the Department, so that we can keep abreast of the times.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; and it says further that "these men advise themselves on all questions affecting great financial matters connected with the Department."

That indicates the character of the clippings made or a limitation on the clippings they make. It indicates that the clippings made do not relate to political matters, they do not relate to personal matters pertaining to the Secretary or the Assistant Secretary, but they relate to great financial matters with which they deal. We probed this matter as best we could to determine whether it was necessary to have a clerk do this work which seems necessary or whether it was more economical to have the Treasury Department subscribe to a clipping bureau, and it was determined that the best thing to do—the most economical action to take—was to leave the matter as we found it, and I still believe our action was wise.

Mr. LITTAUER. I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that this is a pure matter of administration. We do not provide clerks for this specific purpose; we provide a certain number of clerks for the administration of the great office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he determines that each and such clerical force shall be devoted to this purpose pertaining to his Department.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman from New York is very happy in his argument, but let me ask him some questions. Does not the gentleman from New York think that if anything happened in Boston, or any other part of the United States, in connection with the collection of the customs, it would be the duty of the subordinate officers to report to the Treasury Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; from their standpoint; but those opposed to the action of the collector might publish their side of the case in the newspapers, and in that way the Secretary would get the other side of the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me ask the gentleman another question. The gentleman from Texas has stated that one of the purposes of the clipping bureau was to get financial matters in order that these people might be kept abreast of the times. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he has not a provision in this bill somewhere providing an appropriation to buy additional works on financial subjects, and if they do not keep a library in the Treasury Department with all these works on finance, for which they get two to five thousand dollars every year to purchase additional volumes? Isn't there another distinct and separate force in charge of that library?

Mr. LITTAUER. That may be, but what has that got to do with this question? The gentleman must recognize that there are financial movements that take place more quickly than their publication in books.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has got this to do with it; the gentleman from Texas intimated that the purpose of this clerk was to keep the Treasurer abreast of the times on great financial matters.

Mr. LITTAUER. Daily matters.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, I say there is another place in the bill where there is a provision for an increase of this library.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the gentleman must realize that the Secretary of the Treasury must move a little quicker than he would if he had to stop to collect information from these published works on finance.

Mr. JOHNSON. The man fitted to be Secretary of the Treasury ought to be pretty well equipped anyhow.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Office of chief clerk and superintendent: For chief clerk, including $300 as superintendent of Treasury building, $3,000; assistant superintendent of Treasury building, $2,500; inspector of electric-light plants, gas, and fixtures for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $2,250; assistant inspector of electric-light plants and draftsman, $1,800; five clerks of class 4; additional to one clerk of class 4, as bookkeeper, $100; four clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; four clerks of class 1 (one as librarian); one clerk, $1,000; one messenger; two assistant messengers; storekeeper, $1,200; telegraph operator, $1,200; telephone operator and assistant telegraph operator, $1,200; chief engineer, $1,400; three assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; six elevator conductors, at $720 each; three firemen, at $660 each; coal passer, $500; locksmith and electrician, $1,400; captain of the watch, $1,400; two lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; sixty-four watchmen; foreman of laborers, $1,000; skilled laborer, male, $840; wireman, $1,000; two skilled laborers, male, at $720 each; twenty-six laborers; ten laborers, at $500 each; laborer, $480; two laborers, at $480 each; eighty-seven charwomen; foreman of cabinet shop, $1,500; draftsman, $1,200; ten cabinetmakers, at $1,000 each; cabinet maker, $720; carpenter, $1,000; carpenter's helper, $660. For the Winder Building: Engineer, $1,000; three firemen; conductor of elevator, $720; four watchmen; three laborers, one of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the conductor of the elevator; laborer, $480, and six charwomen. For the Cox Building, 1709 New York avenue: Three watchmen-firemen, at $720 each, and one laborer; in all, $184,810.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. On page 39, beginning with the last word on line 12, "wireman," and ending with the word "dollars," in line 13—"wireman, $1,000." Under section 169 of the Revised Statutes—

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Now, I do not know under what provision or under what enumeration in that section this wireman comes. It can not be classified, because it is not in the classified service. The salary that this person had, as we suppose, was $900, and that has been increased to $1,000, and we object to the increase of the salary without some provision of law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Would not the "wireman" come under the designation "other employees?" It seems to me the general designation of "other employees" clearly covers it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. As the Chair understands it, the point of order consists of two branches; first, that the employment of a wireman is not authorized, and second, that the paragraph increases his pay above what he has heretofore received. Is that correct?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that under section 169 of the Revised Statutes, which allows each head of a Department to employ "such clerks, messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year," this wireman may properly be classed as a laborer or other employee within the designation there given. A "wireman" is understood to be a laborer who looks after telegraph, telephone, or other wires. And he is an employee in the office of the Treasury Department which is one of the Executive Departments clearly covered by that statute. Now, as to the compensation, section 169 specifically provides that the employment may be "at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year." It seems, therefore, that the Department is authorized to employ at such compensation as the House in each successive year shall provide. The House is not bound by the appropriation for any previous year but has authority under the statute to fix in this bill the compensation for the year it covers. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following, now authorized and paid from appropriations for construction of public buildings, namely: For assistant to Supervising Architect, $3,250; superintendent of drafting and constructing division, $2,500; two superintendents of technical divisions, at $2,750 each; chief of law records division, $2,000; chief of accounts division, $2,000; chief mechanical and electrical engineer, $2,750; five clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; two clerks of class 1; contract clerk, $2,000; foreman duplicating gallery, $1,800; four technical clerks, who shall also be skilled stenographers and typewriters, at $1,800 each; four inspectors, at $2,190 each; one inspector, $1,800; seven messengers; two laborers; in all, $72,460.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of getting information in relation to this appropriation. The paragraph starts out with the provision:

For the following, now authorized and paid from appropriations, for construction of public buildings.

I would like to know how that appropriation is paid, how it is distributed. Is it paid out of the several appropriations for public buildings here and there around over the country?

Mr. LITTAUER. The paragraph which follows declares that the services of skilled draftsmen, civil engineers, computers, and such other services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order, may be employed only in the office of the Supervising Architect—we put in the word "only" this year—exclusively to carry into effect the various appropriations for the construction of public buildings, to be paid for from and equitably charged against such appropriation. Now, the custom has been that this large force employed in the office of the Supervising Architect, for which provision specifically is made for only two salaries, the salary of the Supervising Architect and one assistant—that the entire force is paid for by what might be termed an assessment on the total amount appropriated for each public building erected, which has averaged somewhere in the neighborhood of about 5 per cent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, suppose a public-building bill shall be enacted this year, and there shall be no other appropriation for public buildings for six or eight or ten years, how is it possible to provide a fund for the payment of this branch of the service? It aggregates this year $72,460, it seems.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, we believed that we were taking up here specifically only such service in connection with the Supervising Architect's office as would be required positively year after year, whether or not public buildings were authorized or otherwise. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the general appropriations in the Treasury Department for the year 1906 were: For repairs and preservation of public buildings, $450,000; heating apparatus, $200,000; vaults, safes, and locks, $40,000; plans for public buildings, $4,000; making a total of $744,000. This work in fact comes under the organization that we attempt to add to the Supervising Architect's office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This work is covered by the appropriations you have just mentioned.

Mr. LITTAUER. In part. In other words, the force could be permanently maintained, but it would be necessary to carry out these regular annual appropriations for maintenance and repair.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I never understood before having read the paragraph in this bill this year that it is the practice to charge this sum against the appropriations made for public buildings.

Mr. LITTAUER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the words of the Secretary in transmitting to us the statement in regard to this cost:

At the above cost, $78,260—

Which we have reduced to $72,460 by the elimination of some of the higher salaries, salaries paid out of the old lump-sum appropriations which we believed to be higher than would have been allowed had they been taken up one by one in the appropriation bill. He says:

At the above cost, $78,260, it is believed that a skeleton organization can be maintained, which could be expended according to the varying number of public buildings under construction from year to year, and at the same time not to be unduly disproportionate to the permanent demands for handling the annual appropriations for repairs, preservation, etc.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is not a new feature of the service, is it?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In every public building that is provided for by Congress about 5 per cent of the amount appropriated is taken out at the Treasury Department for the Architect's force. Now, since this force has been specifically named in this bill and their salaries have been specifically fixed and the money appropriated to pay them, will this 5 per cent continue to be taken out of the appropriation for each public building?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; it will be positively diminished, and if the gentleman will notice the figures in connection with this paragraph he will find that while the estimate for carrying on the Supervising Architect's office for the next year was $225,000, all we appropriate here is $125,000 for the purpose, adding to that the $72,000 for specific force, making in round numbers $200,000, which means we have cut down the total appropriation $25,000; but without considering the reduction of the total amount the Supervising Architect will have to call on the fund for the construction of buildings for a much smaller per cent than he formerly did.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not questioning the amount of the appropriation at all. I just simply wanted to find out if this provision, which I think is wise, will hereafter cause less money than is appropriated for the various buildings to be absorbed in the Treasury Department and more to go into the buildings themselves.

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably, at least to the extent of $72,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the committee has made a wise change.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for State and other Departments: For Auditor, $4,000; Deputy Auditor, $2,500; law clerk, $2,000; three chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; sixteen clerks of class 4; one clerk of class 4 (expert examiner); fifteen clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; five clerks, at $1,000 each; six clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; one assistant messenger; and three laborers; in all, $115,640.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 47, in line 17, strike out "ten" and insert "eleven." In the same line strike out "one clerk, class 4, expert examiner." In lines 20 and 21 strike out "one assistant messenger" and insert "two assistant messengers." In lines 23 and 24 strike out "$64,860" and insert "$69,700."

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Post Office Department: For Auditor, $4,000; two deputy auditors, at $2,500 each; chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; 8 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 36 clerks of class 4; additional to 1 clerk as disbursing clerk, $450; 69 clerks of class 3; 91 clerks of class 2; 119 clerks of class 1; 104 clerks, at $1,000 each; skilled laborer, $1,000; 81 clerks, at $900 each; 70 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 65 skilled laborers, at $660 each; 8 messengers; 15 assistant messengers; 6 watchmen; 25 male laborers, at $660 each; 3 female laborers, at $660 each; and 21 charwomen; in all, $791,410.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CONNER. The reading of the paragraph was not concluded before the interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CONNER. I say the reading of the paragraph was hardly completed when the committee rose informally. I wish to reserve a point of order against a part of the paragraph. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if there is not an increase of chiefs of divisions from seven to eight in lines 15 and 16?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly there is.

Mr. CONNER. I would like also to——

Mr. LITTAUER. And a decrease of clerks of class 4 from 37 to 36.

Mr. CONNER. I would like to inquire if the designation of skilled laborer has been applied to the class now in lines 22 and 23?

Mr. LITTAUER. The designation is that of skilled laborers.

Mr. CONNER. You leave them out by designating them as skilled laborers.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no change made in the current law. I do not know for how many years back they have been called skilled laborers.

Mr. CONNER. Is it not true, as claimed by some, that there is no chance for these people to secure any promotion, classed as they are?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, it is a question whether or not it is a class of service that needs great promotion. There are skilled laborers in this office at $660 and others at $720. Of course those who are now receiving the lower compensation could be advanced to the higher.

Mr. CONNER. Should not they have some opportunity for promotion as these higher classes have?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe that $720 is a sufficient compensation for work of the character that these people do.

Mr. CONNER. Are there not some clerks receiving $1,200 and $1,400 who are doing the same class of work as these skilled laborers?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am not advised that there are.

Mr. CONNER. Have you investigated that phase of the question?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe our attention was not called to it.

Mr. CONNER. Have they not taken the civil-service examination?

Mr. LITTAUER. If they are on the rolls, they have taken the regular civil-service examination.

Mr. CONNER. Were they not formerly designated as money-order sorters?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not within my experience. I do not know what it may have been many years ago.

Mr. CONNER. And while so designated did they not have an opportunity for promotion?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know.

Mr. CONNER. Have you investigated this question?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not. We simply find here a sum provided for a certain force carried along as it has been for a number of years past. What may have happened five, eight, or ten years ago I do not know.

Mr. TAWNEY. With the permission of my colleague, the matter was not called to the attention of the committee at all with reference to the promotion of the skilled laborer to the position of clerk or that skilled laborers were doing the work of clerks.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It has been the practice of this office to promote from the position of skilled laborer to that of a clerical position in years past, but they do not do it now.

Mr. LITTAUER. About how many years ago?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. About four years ago. Now it requires an examination.

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me these people would have to take a different civil-service examination. There is an examination for the work of a skilled laborer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course a skilled laborer in the service is classed as such, and if he had certain clerical character of service they would be promoted regularly.

Mr. PAYNE. If they take an examination they go on the rolls or eligible list according to their standing.

Mr. LITTAUER. Their work is assorting and counting money orders, which is not a high character of work.

Mr. CONNER. If they had the title of money assorters they would be in a class where they could be promoted. Why not permit the change to be made?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe it would answer a good purpose in the service. What is the necessity of it? Surely anyone who receives this compensation for that character of work is well paid.

Mr. CONNER. If they had the star of hope to inspire them it would enable them to furnish better service. They are put there without any possibility of promotion.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you mean promotion to the position of clerk?

Mr. CONNER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. They can get that now by taking a clerical examination.

Mr. CONNER. I desire to reserve a point of order against this paragraph.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is too late for a point of order.

Mr. CONNER. I said I reserved the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CONNER. The point of order I desire to make is, in lines 15 and 16——

The CHAIRMAN. What page?

Mr. CONNER. Page 48—increasing chiefs of divisions from seven to eight.

Mr. LITTAUER. Under the rules I can not believe that that point of order will properly lie. We have here the service and the Secretary of the Treasury recommends these changes, and particularly recommends them because they would involve no increase in the total amount of the estimates, and will provide a better organization of the force of said office. And it is authorized by section 169, as ruled upon this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to concede that there is no authority of law for the additional chief of division?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, I do not concede that. I believe that in section 169 there is ample authority for this increase of chiefs of division. It is a part of the necessary service not specifically mentioned there, but among the other employees.

Mr. CONNER. I do not think section 169 would apply to a chief of division.

Mr. LITTAUER. "And other employees, at such rates of compensation"——

The CHAIRMAN. This is an appropriation for the Treasury Department, which is one of the Departments contemplated by the act of Congress of which section 169 of the Revised Statutes is part. It is there provided that—

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, and laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The purpose of that statute is to provide for the administration of the Department. A chief of division is absolutely as necessary for that administration as a clerk or messenger, and the words "other employees" unquestionably cover it, because they show the intention of the statute to cover the administration of the Departments, and no man on this floor would dare say that without chiefs of division you could administer any Department under the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The language specifically includes "such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law," and those classes are defined in section 167 as clerks of the fourth class, third class, second class, and first class, and in addition to those clerks such "messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees," etc. The question is whether——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A great many of the chiefs are simply fourth-class clerks—$1,800 clerks.

Mr. TAWNEY. On the point of order I will say that it seems to me very clear that the language "and other employees" includes any employee in an Executive Department who is not mentioned in the statutory classification or included in classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, or who is not otherwise specifically mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he thinks it would include an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think it would include any employee. An Assistant Secretary is not an employee. He is an official in the Department. He is appointed by the President under a different law entirely. Now, if you will read the section:

> Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks * * * and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

It would seem to be clear that that includes all the employees that are necessary in the administration of the Department, in addition to those who are specifically enumerated. The general language "all other employees" is intended to include all who are not specifically enumerated. The other employees are not excluded because of the specific enumeration of clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. As an example of that, Mr. Chairman,

I want to bring to your attention the fact that the Treasury Department, under that very statute, employs special agents. They are called special agents. They are not enumerated there, but they are absolutely necessary for the administration of the Department, and I want to bring to your attention that that statute is intended to cover those that were necessary for the administration of the Department, and therefore they used the expression "other employees."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, one word further with regard to this statute. The Chair will observe that this statute was enacted away back in 1850. I presume at that time there were no chiefs of divisions. At least we did not have the same organization that we have now in the Departments.

We did not have the same designation of employees, except the specific classes were from 1 to 4, inclusive, and the laborers and messengers that we have always had. Now, the term "other employees" includes all employees that are necessary by reason of the growth of the service. Although not specifically designated or provided for, they are included in the general term "other employees."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to add that at that time chiefs of divisions were not known specifically to the law, and consequently they must be included in the words "other employees."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to give very great weight to the arguments that have been advanced were it not for the fact that the question has apparently been clearly ruled upon in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. The question raised was under this same section 169 of the Revised Statutes, and the ruling seems to have been that in the use of the phrase "clerks and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, laborers, and other employees" the term "other employees" was used at the end of a diminishing scale and would not authorize any employee above the grade of clerk of the fourth class.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the Chair a moment in order to state that I have found a statute which specifically authorizes these eight chiefs of divisions? I find that under the act reorganizing the Treasury Department in 1875, in section 2 of the legislative appropriation act, under the head of "Offices of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department," provision is made for eight chiefs of divisions, at $2,100 each. The section reads as follows:

On and after July 1, 1875, the organization of the Treasury Department, and the several offices thereof, and the annual salaries paid persons therein, shall be as follows, to wit.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order urged by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONNER] is against "eight chiefs of division at $2,000 each," which, he insists, is an increase of one beyond the amount authorized by law. It is unnecessary to consider section 169 of the Revised Statutes in this connection, for the attention of the Chair has been called to the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, which was itself an appropriation bill, but contains this item of permanent legislation. Section 2, page 396, volume 18, of the Statutes at Large, says:

On and after July 1, 1875, the organization of the Treasury Department, and the several offices therein, and the annual salaries paid to persons thereof, shall be as follows, to wit.

Then, following a number of items on the following page in the same, is this:

The Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, $4,000; Deputy Auditor, $2,500; eight chiefs of division, at $2,100 each.

So there is authority of law. Although that was in an appropriation bill it was in a permanent form, not for that year only, but for all time until changed, after July 1, 1875. It clearly authorizes eight chiefs of divisions. There is, therefore, authority of law for the appropriation, and the point of order is overruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency: For Comptroller of the Currency, $5,000; Deputy Comptroller, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,500; five chiefs of division, at $2,200 each; eight clerks of class 4; additional to bond clerk, $200; stenographer, $1,600; thirteen clerks of class 3; fifteen clerks of class 2; eleven clerks of class 1; fourteen clerks at $1,000 each; engineer, $1,000; thirteen clerks, at $900 each; one messenger, four assistant messengers; one fireman; three laborers; in all, $121,920.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the provision on page 51, line 16, as to the increase of the salary of the Deputy Comptroller of the Currency. I make this point of order simply against the words "five hundred." The salary of the Deputy Comptroller of the Currency was fixed by the act of 1864, to be found in section 327 of the Revised Statutes, at $2,500. Later, by the act of March 3, 1875, to be found in the Supplement, volume 1, Revised Statutes, page 76, it was fixed at $3,000. The provision in this bill fixes it at thirty-five hundred dollars. Now, it is true that in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of last year, when it came back from the Senate, it was carried at $3,500. Before that, in the House, a point of order was made against the $500, and it was stricken out. It came back from the Senate with thirty-five hundred dollars, and was left in by the conferees. I make the point of order that the increase of $500 is contrary to existing law.

If the Chair has the Statutes before him, I will repeat it. I say by the act of 1864.

Mr. LITTAUER. The statute fixes the salary, Mr. Chairman. We appreciate that.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not make the point of order against the $3,000, but simply against the $500. That is all I desire to have go out. I want to say that I propose to follow it up if it comes back from the Senate increased, and I shall try to keep it from going in the bill. The point of order, I understand, is admitted to be good. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticisms to make of the Committee on Appropriations, but it seems to me that an increase in salary ought not to be made in this way. It is admitted to be a fact, and now there is no excuse, and there is no construction to be put upon any statute except that the statute fixes it at $3,000, and it has stood there for over thirty years. There is no reason given in the report by the Committee on Appropriations why this increase should be made, and there is none presented upon the floor of the House.

Mr. LITTAUER. Why, the gentleman must realize that this official, the Deputy Comptroller, acts in the place of the Comptroller of the Currency during his absence.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that it has been many times recommended by the Comptroller of the Currency that the salary be raised and also concurred in by the Secretary of the Treasury. He is a bonded officer, a man performing very valued services.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand all that, and also that the Comptroller of the Currency is a gentleman of great wealth and of considerable leisure. Now, if the Deputy Comptroller of the Currency is called on, as he may be, to perform the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency while the latter is visiting in Europe, then the Deputy Comptroller ought to be given the place of the Comptroller; but so long as the statute stands unaltered, fixing the salary of the Deputy Comptroller, and has stood since 1875, at $3,000, I do not think that the Committee on Appropriations ought to undertake to increase it, without any reference to it, on an appropriation bill. There is no mention of the increase in the report by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not on the point of order, but only to state that I know not whether the Comptroller of the Currency is rich or not, but I do know that he is a hard-working, able officer, as is his deputy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that section 2 of the act of March 3, 1875, provides that the annual salary to be paid to the Deputy Comptroller shall be $3,000. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair will be compelled to sustain it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that the point of order is sustained with reference to the five hundred only. I do not want the three thousand to go out. I want that to remain in the bill. I desire to inquire of the Chair the effect of the ruling?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I inquire, Mr. Chairman, whether or not the five hundred alone is excluded?

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as those words verbally and separately appear, five hundred, and the point of order is addressed to them only, the Chair has sustained the point of order precisely as it was made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The words "five hundred" only. Not the word "dollars?"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order precisely as it was made by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: For Commissioner of Internal Revenue, $6,000; deputy commissioner, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $3,000; chemist, $2,500; two boards of divisions, at $2,500 each; six boards of divisions, at $2,250 each; superintendent of stamp vault, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; twenty-seven clerks of class 4; twenty-five clerks of class 3; thirty-six clerks of class 2; thirty-seven clerks of class 1; thirty clerks, at $1,000 each; forty-seven clerks, at $900 each; two messengers; nineteen assistant messengers; and twenty laborers; in all, $322,660.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, lines 1 and 2, strike out the word "twenty-seven" and insert the word "twenty-eight;" and in line 7 strike out the word "six"

and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight;" so that it will read: "Three hundred and twenty-two thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would state that this merely corrects a total.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments will be considered together. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following, now authorized and being paid from appropriations for engraving and printing in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, namely: For disbursing agent, $2,400; storekeeper, $1,600; assistant storekeeper, $1,000; clerk in charge of purchases and supplies, $2,000; two clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; five clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; ten clerks, at $900 each; four clerks, at $840 each; five clerks, at $780 each; nine attendants, at $600 each; one helper, $900; three helpers, at $720 each; two helpers, at $600 each; three messengers, four assistant messengers; captain of the watch, $1,400; two lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; forty watchmen; two forewomen of charwomen, at $540 each; nineteen day charwomen, at $400 each; forty-seven morning and evening charwomen, at $300 each; foremen of laborers, $900; four laborers; fifty-seven laborers, at $540 each; in all, $155,220; and no other fund appropriated by this or any other act shall be used for services, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, of the character specified in this and the foregoing paragraph.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PRINCE. For the purpose of reserving the point of order as against that portion of the bill just read, beginning on line 10, page 54, and ending with line 10, page 55, on the ground that it is new legislation. I would like to hear the reason for that legislation.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph is for services now authorized and being paid from appropriations for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is not a new service. We simply seek here to draw out of the lump-sum appropriation granted this Bureau the forces which are entirely executive or administrative and separate them from the forces devoted to the work of the Bureau, and in doing so we have brought about a few economies, in all $2,051. It is one of the large forces that we found formerly appropriated for in a lump sum, but which we have sought to specifically provide for. Hereafter Congress will control the salaries and the additions to this force.

Mr. PRINCE. I would ask the gentleman a question. Has the force been enlarged?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not at all; it has been diminished.

Mr. PRINCE. Then you have only segregated——

Mr. LITTAUER. We have segregated those devoted to the administrative or the executive end of this Bureau.

Mr. PRINCE. Where have those provisions been carried heretofore?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the sundry civil bill.

Mr. PRINCE. And never have appeared in the House before in this shape?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; except for the salaries of the Director and a few clerks. I think a total force of about ten.

Mr. PRINCE. Inasmuch as it has never been before Congress, except in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and it seems to be a wise segregation of items of apropriations, I withdraw the objection I made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York one question.

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it true these people have heretofore been paid out of a lump sum?

Mr. LITTAUER. They have been paid out of the appropriation for carrying on the work of engraving and printing.

Mr. JOHNSON. And the appropriation was made in a lump sum?

Mr. LITTAUER. The appropriation was made in one total sum and amounted to over $2,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. I notice the young women over there in the department have been working for very low wages. Has any provision been made to give them higher compensation for their work?

Mr. LITTAUER. There has not been. Moreover, the service to which the gentleman refers is the working service. We simply provide for what is known as the "clerical service," what is called the "administrative service," which includes the watch force, charwomen, etc., but the girls who work in the operating force and who are paid low wages are not controlled by the provisions of this bill at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. I notice a very great number of very bright-looking girls there are paid these wages, and it seems to be very responsible work, and I understand they are paid only a dollar and a half or two dollars a day.

Mr. LITTAUER. They are workers; they are not part of the executive force, and we only provide for the executive force.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secret-service division: For one chief, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,500; one clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 3; two clerks of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, $1,000; one clerk, $900; and one attendant, $720; in all, $16,520.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from New York how many secret-service men are employed under this provision, and where are they?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will say this is the clerical force of the secret-service office.

Mr. HAY. I understand that, but I want to find out where in the bill the secret-service men are carried.

Mr. LITTAUER. They are not provided for in this bill at all, but are provided for in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HAY. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Surgeon-General of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service: For Surgeon-General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; three clerks of class 4; three clerks of class 3; private secretary to the Surgeon-General, $1,800; six clerks of class 2, one of whom shall be translator; five clerks of class 1; clerk and translator, $1,200; three clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; three assistant messengers; and two laborers, at $540 each; in all, $41,380.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask a question of the chairman having in charge the bill. I want to ask the gentleman from New York if the Marine-Hospital Service does not collect a large sum of money each year in the way of fees?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not at all, so far as I am advised.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, I see in the report of the chief of the Marine-Hospital Service that the tonnage tax collected was $858,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, the tonnage tax is collected just the same as customs taxes are collected, and this Service is supported out of taxes so collected.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that the Marine-Hospital Service is collecting annually a large amount of money in the way of fees which are not covered into the Treasury directly and an appropriation made for the support of the Service?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not know of any fees being collected. Heretofore they have been turning over the tonnage fees for the support of the Marine-Hospital Service, but that law was repealed last year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That law has been repealed? Then the taxes hereafter collected——

Mr. LITTAUER. Will be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Are covered into the Treasury.

Mr. LITTAUER. And a direct appropriation made for every expenditure connected with the Service?

Mr. SLAYDEN. That has not been the case heretofore, though?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not until last year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then I congratulate the gentleman in having made that reformation.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLLECTING INTERNAL REVENUE.

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, and deputy collectors, and surveyors, and clerks in internal-revenue offices, $2,000,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I desire to offer there.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "dollars," in line 24, page 60, the following: "Provided, That each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid, and upon application of any person he shall furnish a certified copy of such alphabetical list, or a copy of the tax receipt or receipts issued to any person, company, or corporation, as of a public record, for which a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested may be charged."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to make the point of order against that, or I will reserve it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is the point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. This proposed amendment is a change of existing law, and violative of the second clause of Rule XXI. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how the expenses of collecting the revenue compare with former years? I see you provide here for an expenditure of $2,000,000 and also $2,200,000 for collecting the internal revenue. How does that compare with the allowance to the Internal Revenue office last year?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are exactly the same amounts as we make to the Internal Revenue office last year. In other words, there are three appropriations made here. One of $2,000,000, the other of $2,500,000; and then we have added a new paragraph of $85,000, which is the only addition to the expense of the Internal Revenue Service carried here. We made this particular amount because we found that we were asked for an additional appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Then there is an increased appropriation?

Mr. LITTAUER. Of $85,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Eighty-five thousand dollars over last year, and the method of putting these items all in one lump sum is one that has been pursued before?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, in part. The amounts paid out in these sums are in nearly all cases statutory, and it depends a great deal upon the amount of work carried on at the various distilleries as to how much is expended. We therefore have this year a considerable deficiency. It happens because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is never able to determine beforehand what force he may require. Our object in separating the item of $85,000 from the other two items was because it was paying rent and miscellaneous expenditure. We want to separate rent and other incidental expenses outside of the District of Columbia, because under our new law they must be apportioned so as to avoid a deficiency.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, has it always been the custom to appropriate the money for collecting internal revenue in a lump sum?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; it has been the practice at least for more than ten years.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the gentleman not think that the time has come when it should be classified?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is already classified and the compensation provided by law; but the number of employees has not been specified.

Mr. JOHNSON. Because the number varies the appropriation is made in a lump sum?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; for that reason it is made in a lump sum, but the details are all specified by statute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no discretion in the Commissioner in the expenditure of this money at all. Now, recently I read the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to your committee, and it seemed to me he made a very strong case for an increase in the appropriation.

Mr. LITTAUER. We felt so, decidedly. The second item of appropriation, of $2,200,000 "for salaries and expenses of forty revenue agents provided for by law, and fees and expenses of gaugers, salaries and expenses of storekeepers, and storekeeper-gaugers," why, we might just as well appropriate $3,000,000 as $2,200,000, because the Commission can only spend an amount for the force needed to carry on the work.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, you increase his appropriation to the amount of this rent?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And he has been taking that out of another item under his control?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

Office of assistant treasurer at Baltimore: For assistant treasurer, $3,500; cashier, $2,500; three clerks, at $1,800 each; two clerks, at $1,600 each; four clerks, at $1,400 each; bookkeeper and three clerks, at $1,200 each; three clerks, at $1,000 each; messenger, $840; three watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $32,000.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "three," in line 15, on page 61, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five;" and in line 18, on the same page strike out "two" and insert "four."

Mr. WACHTER. The object of this amendment is to increase the number of clerks asked for and given by the committee from two to three. There are reasons why this force should be augmented, and in order that the committee may thoroughly understand it I will ask the Clerk to read the request from the subtreasurer at Baltimore to the Secretary of the Treasury in Washington as to the number of clerks required.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baltimore, Md., January 30, 1906.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: At the time of making up the estimate for salaries of this office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, I find that I should have estimated for a considerable increase in the force of this office. I was so desirous, however, not to ask for more than was absolutely necessary that, after several conferences with the cashier on the subject, it was thought that by sacrificing a portion of the annual leave allowed the clerks under the law, the business might be carried on for another year with the present force.

Since the estimate was sent in the work of the office has already grown far beyond what was anticipated at the time, and promises to expand to such an extent that I am now compelled, for the good of the service, to present the urgent necessity for an immediate increase in the working force.

In this connection, and to give some idea of the present situation experienced here, I invite attention to the increase in the business, as shown by a comparison of the receipts and disbursements for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1903, 1904, and 1905, respectively, to wit:

1903	$108,450,949
1905	161,316,652

During my incumbency the business has increased by over $50,000,000. The volume of business in 1904 was entirely sufficient to fully employ the present force of this office. In the fiscal year of 1905 the handling of an increase of nearly $40,000,000 was accomplished only by requiring the force to work longer hours and under greater strain than is compatible with the health of the men and the safe and satisfactory conduct of the public business.

The work of redeeming coin and currency is increasing all the time. For example, the currency unfit for circulation received here during the current month, counted, assorted, and shipped to the Department for redemption, has been over $2,000,000. More than two-thirds of this amount was received in notes of the denominations of ones, twos, and fives. The coin receipts have also greatly increased, since the first of the current month aggregating in silver coin nearly $400,000, and in minor coin (nickels and pennies) over $70,000.

Since the annual estimate was sent in, the account of the United States pension agency at Washington has been increased from less than 15,000 to 50,000 checks per quarter, over 40,000 having been paid on this account during the last month alone. The pension agent has advised that all his checks, amounting to some 65,000 per quarter, which have hitherto been drawn upon and paid at the New York and Washington offices, will hereafter be drawn on this office, aggregating a disbursement of some $9,000,000 per annum to be paid here, for the most part in checks of small amounts, viz: $12, $18, $24, and $36. The work of examining indorsements, paying, entering on the cash book and ledger, canceling, arranging in numerical order, listing, and reporting to the pension agent the regular monthly statements of his account and balances, etc., is employment in itself for at least four efficient clerks and tellers working constantly.

The account for the service of the Post-Office Department has been growing for several years, so that where about 4,000 warrants were paid annually nearly as many are now paid monthly. The increase in this item alone is sufficient to occupy the entire time of at least one experienced clerk.

To handle with promptness and safety this greatly increased and increasing business, this office should have, really, an addition of five experienced and competent tellers. I would hesitate to attempt it with less than this number, added to those already employed here, were it not for the exceptional zeal and efficiency—the outgrowth of years of experience—of the cashier and the paying teller. Although their manifold duties and responsibilities have been multiplied many times, and are still multiplying, the salaries are the same as when this office was first established, and when the aggregate of receipts and disbursements was less than one-fourth of the present volume. Their compensation is much below that commanded by similar qualifications in the banks and trust companies of this city and elsewhere. The business of this office requires now, more than ever before, the services of such trained and competent officials. Therefore, as a matter of justice and recognition of merit, I have the honor to recommend that the compensation of the cashier be increased from $2,500 to $3,000 per annum, and that of the paying teller from $1,800 to $2,500 per annum; and, for the good of the service, the increase of the force of this office as follows, viz: Three clerks, each competent to perform the duties of teller, with compensation of $1,600 per annum for two and $1,400 per annum for one.

Respectfully,

A. LINCOLN DAYDEN,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the reading of this statement brings before the committee and brings to the attention of the House the same character of appeals that the Committee on Appropriations have been listening to for many weeks. Any one of these gentlemen will give very complete reasons for an increase of force and increased salaries and then call to our attention certain large figures descriptive of the work performed. When the annual estimates came to us, we found that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended the same appropriation as for the current year, $31,000. Last year we added to this force two clerks at $1,600. Two years previously we had added two clerks at $1,400 and one clerk at $1,200; but after the estimates had been received the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Keep, called to our attention the new service that the assistant treasurer was performing in connection with pension disbursements, and told us that it was proper to allow him an additional clerk at $1,000, to handle this extra amount of vouchers sent to this office, and now without any departmental recommendation we are asked to add two more clerks.

I trust that the committee will not take it upon itself to increase this force without at least proper investigation and the recommendation of the Department having it in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WACHTER].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WACHTER) there were—ayes 44, noes 33.

Accordingly, the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: For assistant treasurer, $5,000; cashier, $2,500; vault clerk, $1,800; paying teller, $1,800; assorting teller, $1,800; silver and redemption teller, and change teller, at $1,800 each; receiving teller, $1,700; clerk, $1,600; one bookkeeper, $1,800; two bookkeepers, at $1,500 each; assistant paying teller, $1,500; four coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each; twenty-six clerks, at $1,200 each; one detective and hall man, $1,100; messenger, $840; stenographer, $900; janitor, $600; and three watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $68,900.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDWICK. To make two points of order. First, in line 18, page 62, I see there is a change teller added at $1,800. I make the point of order that that is a new office, not carried by the previous bill or created by existing law. In line 21 there is an additional bookkeeper not authorized by existing law, and I make the same point of order against that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this is the office of the assistant treasurer at Chicago and is a service provided for by law. The place of change teller and bookkeeper is a service known to the law. It is a continuation of a work in progress, and I can not believe that a point of order will properly lie against these provisions. The statute establishes the Treasury and its work.

The CHAIRMAN. It is difficult at all times for the Chair to hear, but if the Chair correctly understands the gentleman from Georgia, his point of order is against the words "change teller." Is that correct?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; only one of them—the change teller.

The CHAIRMAN. What law does the gentleman contend that changes?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no law at all for it. That is the point I make. This is not a class below the grade of a clerk of the fourth class, and it does not come under the statute so often cited by the Chair, being an office higher than clerk of class 4. There is no authority of law for it, and it is not carried in any previous appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. In what way is there no authority of law?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a clerk in the classified service, and there is no question about the right of the House to appropriate for it in this bill. The fundamental law under which the Treasury Department is organized distinctly gives Congress the right to appropriate for such clerks as are needed, and the simple designation of "change clerk" does not make him different from any other clerk.

Mr. HARDWICK. I call the attention of the Chair to the report of the committee, in which they say that it is an increase. I take their word for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York what authority of law there is for these change tellers?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Revised Statutes, section 3595, establishes this subtreasury office at Chicago. It says:

There shall be an assistant treasurer of the United States appointed from time to time by the President to serve for the term of four years, one at Chicago.

The salary of the assistant treasurer is then specified at $5,000, and this section goes on at length to detail the work and functions of these assistant treasurers and the work that they are to perform under the law. By law they are authorized to act as depositaries, disburse public moneys, and perform other duties. It seems to me the establishment of the office is an enactment under the law for the performance of the duties necessary to carry out these authorized services, and must necessarily be included in it.

Moreover, if this is subject to a point of order, then every other clerk in connection with this office not specifically authorized in the statute might be thrown out of the bill on a point of order. There is as much provision for these new offices as for the tellers.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will turn to section 3611 he will find the force specified there is very meager for the Chicago subtreasury. Pretty nearly all the force that is provided in the bill would have to go out.

Mr. LITTAUER. Except four or five clerks specified in the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds in section 3611 of the Revised Statutes this provision:

There shall be employed in the office of the assistant treasurer at Chicago one cashier, at $2,500 a year; one clerk, at $1,800 a year; two clerks, at $1,500 a year; one clerk, at $1,200 a year; one messenger, at $840, and one watchman, at $720.

Unless there is some additional legislation to which the attention of the Chair has not been called, it would appear that——

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a public work in progress. The law specifies for a certain amount of aid to carry on this work, and there has been from time to time additional service allowed for. It seems to me the authorization to continue the work must carry with it a right to have sufficient force to carry out that work. This section the Chair is referring to was passed in 1873, over thirty years ago. This public work has been carried on and extended from time to time. The revenues are probably many times greater than they were then. How can a public work be carried out if we have not the means for doing so? It seems to me it is an authorized work in progress.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is no more important office in the country than the subtreasurer's office at Chicago. It seems to me that that ought to be taken into consideration in the ruling that is to be made on this point. If these clerks are to be stricken from the bill, it would embarrass the business of the office and of the country. When the subtreasury was created it was intended that such help should be employed in the office as was needed. Large additions to the force have been made from time to time, and no question has been raised as to the validity of such action. The business of the office is continually growing; its importance is becoming more and more manifest. There can be no doubt of the great need of the men who are specified in this bill, and if the Chair is about to rule against it, I appeal to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] not to insist on his point of order, but to withdraw it in order that he may not embarrass the people who have to conduct business through the office about which this controversy has just arisen.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am ready for the gentleman to have his relief in the proper way, like everybody else, but I decline to withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 3611 of the Revised Statutes expressly declares the officers and employees that shall be employed in the office of the assistant treasurer at Chicago and fixes their salaries. That statute does not appear to include the two offices against which these points of order are directed, and the Chair has not been pointed to any subsequent legislation authorizing them.

The suggestion is made that the appropriation may be considered as in continuation of appropriations for a Government work already in progress, and as such within the exception found in clause 2 of Rule XXI. A similar point was raised and decided in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress upon a paragraph in an appropriation bill increasing the number of members of the Board of Pension Appeals. Mr. Payson, of Illinois, an experienced parliamentarian, then in the chair, having heard exhaustive debate and considered the question overnight, rendered an exhaustive ruling, found in section 502 of Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents, in the course of which he held that the phrase "public works" contemplates only tangible matters, such as buildings, roads, and the like, and not the ordinary duties of an executive or administrative office. The Chair thinks that the duties of a teller or clerk in receiving or disbursing money or keeping Treasury accounts do not fall within the legislative description of "public works already in progress." It may well be that the great increase of business since the designation of clerks and officers by the act of 1873 justifies or requires an increased number in the office of the assistant treasurer at Chicago, but in order to sustain an appropriation for them under the rules of this House there must first be legislation authorizing such increase. Without such previous authority for the expenditure the appropriation can not remain in the bill if the rule is invoked against it. There being no authority of law for the specific appropriations to which the point of order is urged, the Chair must sustain the point.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 24, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIABILITY OF EMPLOYERS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the report from the Committee on Judiciary on the bill H. R. 239, the employers' liability bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 154, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report, in lieu thereof, the following:

Resolved, That at or before 2 o'clock to-day the House shall consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule, the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulate the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy, and at the hour of 4.30 p. m., this day, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on such amendments as may be pending and on the bill to its final passage.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the House is familiar with the necessity for some legislation looking toward relief of the academy at Annapolis, and the purpose of this rule is to afford the House an opportunity to consider the bill to that end reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. The plan, however, is to allow the Pensions Committee to occupy the time until they have exhausted their Calendar, which we understand will not take much more than an hour, and then proceed with the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, the previous question to be considered as ordered at half past 4 o'clock on the bill and amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the minority members of the Committee on Rules do not desire any division of the House upon the question of the adoption of the rule, nor do they desire to consume the usual twenty minutes in the discussion of the rule, with this understanding, however, that later on, under the five-minute rule, the gentleman from North Carolina, Hon. W. W. KITCHIN, may have twenty minutes in which to give his views in opposition to the pending legislation.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if under the rule a substitute would be in order?

Mr. DALZELL. Everything is in order that would be in considering the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—suppose at 4.30 the bill has not been completely read. Will it then be in order to offer amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. Under the rule the previous question is ordered at 4.30 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose some portion of the bill has not been read, how will it be possible to offer an amendment to that portion of the bill?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I think that would be unfortunate and that was not contemplated at all. The possibility of such a thing was not contemplated, and I will say to the gentleman it is a very short bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not seen the bill, and I wished to inquire if that contingency could arise and make it impossible to offer an amendment to a portion of the bill over which there might be the greatest controversy.

Mr. DALZELL. There did not seem to be any difference of opinion in the Committee on Rules as to the time being sufficient to consider the bill and every amendment. It is a short bill.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state a substitute would be in order, but under the rule is a substitute in order until you have read the bill through and perfected it?

Mr. DALZELL. I should think the substitute might be considered as pending, and so a vote could be had on it when the vote is taken at 4.30.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a few observations upon the pension bill that has just been reached on the Calendar. Members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions have expressed to me a fear that the bill will not be recommended by the Senate Committee on Pensions. A rule has been adopted by that committee providing that where a widow loses her pensionable status by remarriage the committee will not recommend a bill for her relief, but in this case Mrs. Carr never had a pensionable status. She was married in 1850 to John Card. He was a soldier in the civil war for three years and three months. He served honorably and creditably during that war and was honorably discharged from the service. The wife remained at home and looked after the household, which included three small children. When her husband was discharged from the service he returned home and they lived together until 1877, when his treatment of her became so bad that she was compelled to apply for a divorce, and a divorce was granted to her upon the grounds of extreme cruelty. Seven children were the result of their union, and the custody of the minor children was granted to her. In 1879 she married another veteran of the civil war—William I. Carr—and lived with him most of the time until 1903, when he died. He was a commissioned officer in the Twentieth Indiana Regiment, and drew a pension for a gunshot wound received in the service. After his death she applied for a pension under the law of 1890, and her application was rejected because her husband had not been honorably discharged. He was dishonorably dismissed from the service; but under the law he was entitled to a pension for injuries received in line of duty, and therefore he was able to obtain a pension, I think, of $8 a month for gunshot wound; but because of his record she was unable under the laws to obtain a pension. She had, of course, no pensionable status as the wife or widow of her first husband, because she was separated from him by a decree of divorce. Now, the Committee on Invalid Pensions recommends this bill giving to this widow, who is 72 years of age, absolutely without means of support, the small pittance of $8 a month. I would not have interposed any remarks here if the report of the committee had shown the equitable side this claim presents to the Government. My judgment is that the claim is much stronger upon the gratitude of the country because of the fact that Mrs. Carr was the wife of a soldier and the mother of small children during the progress of the civil war and remained at home, as thousands of other patriotic mothers and wives did, and underwent the awful agony of those months and years of distress and danger, fearing that every mail would bring tidings of the death of the head of the household.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the wives of the soldiers who were enlisted under the flag of the Union, fighting for its defense, have some individual claims of their own upon the gratitude of the country, based upon their own personal sacrifices. The strong feature of this claim is that Eunice M. Carr for three years and three months remained in her humble home in Indiana looking after the brood of small children that were left under her care, while her husband and their father was at the front fighting for the preservation of his country. She is now old and poor, and it would be an everlasting disgrace for the Government to permit her to become an inmate of a poorhouse and die and be buried as a common pauper.

I have risen, Mr. Speaker, to put these remarks in the RECORD in order that, if there should be any question about the merits of this bill when it is considered by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate or by the President, all the facts may be known. Mrs. Carr does not base her right to a pension merely upon the fact that in 1879 she married a veteran of the civil war who had been dishonorably discharged, although he was able to draw a pension himself. That is not the real basis of her claim. It is because she was the wife of a soldier while he was in the service, and the law should not have compelled her to have lived with her first husband and withstand his brutality in order that she as his widow might have any claim upon the gratitude of the country. Her first husband is dead. He left no widow. There is no pension being paid on account of his service.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the military record of the first husband of this claimant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the gentleman from Indiana will be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD as requested. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 15, 1906.

Hon. E. D. CRUMPACKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your letter of yesterday, received to-day, in which you request to be furnished with the military record of John Card, late of Company H, Ninth Indiana Infantry, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

The records show that John Card was enrolled August 14, 1861, and was mustered into service September 5, 1861, as a wagoner in Company H, Ninth Indiana Infantry, to serve during the war, and that he was discharged the service as a wagoner December 20, 1862, at Indianapolis, Ind., on surgeon's certificate of disability.

The records also show that one John Card, who had prior service in the Ninth Indiana Infantry, was enrolled December 19, 1863, and was mustered into service to date January 12, 1864, as a private in Company M, Twelfth Indiana Cavalry, to serve three years, and that he was mustered out of service with the company as commissary-sergeant November 10, 1865.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say in reply to what the gentleman from Indiana has suggested. The facts are these: This lady is not the widow of the gentleman who had the service. She remarried, and under the rule of the Senate she is not entitled to any pension at all. But in view of what the gentleman has suggested, which he has said so much better than I could say it, we have allowed her $8 per month. There are more than 170,000 widows in this country who receive but $8 a month; and so far as the Senate rules are concerned, we are making an exception in behalf of my friend's beneficiary. I think the recommendation of the committee ought to stand.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and only took occasion to add these remarks to the report of the committee in order that when the case goes to the Committee on Pensions in the Senate they may have these remarks as supplementary and additional reasons why the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House acted wisely and justly in this case.

The SPEAKER. The bill will have to be read, unless by unanimous consent.

But no midshipman shall be dismissed for a single act of hazing except under the provisions of section 3 of this act.

SEC. 3. That the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy may, in his discretion and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, cause any midshipman in the said academy to be tried by court-martial for the offense of hazing, as provided by the act approved June 23, 1874, and such court-martial, upon conviction, may sentence such midshipman to any punishment authorized by the said act or by the act approved March 3, 1903, or authorized for any violation or breach of the rules of the said academy by the said rules, or, in cases of brutal or cruel hazing may, in addition to dismissal, sentence such midshipman to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year: Provided, That such midshipman shall not be confined in a military or naval prison or elsewhere with men who have been convicted of crimes or misdemeanors; and such finding and sentence shall be subject to review by the convening authority and by the Secretary of the Navy, as in the cases of other courts-martial.

SEC. 4. That the offense of "hazing," as mentioned in this act, shall consist of any unauthorized assumption of authority by one midshipman over another midshipman whereby the last-mentioned midshipman shall or may suffer or be exposed to suffer any cruelty, indignity, humiliation, hardship, or oppression, or the deprivation or abridgment of any right, privilege, or advantage to which he shall be legally entitled.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every professor, assistant professor, academic officer, or instructor, as well as every other officer stationed at the United States Naval Academy, to promptly report to the Superintendent therof any fact which comes to his attention tending to indicate any violation by a midshipman or midshipmen of any of the provisions of this act or any violation of the regulations of the said academy. Any naval officer attached to the academy who shall fail to make such report as provided in this section shall be tried by court-martial for neglect of duty, and if convicted he shall be dismissed from the service. Any civilian instructor attached to the academy who shall fail to make such report as provided in this section shall be dismissed by the Superintendent of the academy upon the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect from the date of its approval, but no midshipman now connected with the United States Naval Academy shall, by reason of its enactment, be punished for any offense heretofore committed otherwise than in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial (if, by existing law, such sentence would be now necessary for such punishment) or punished more severely than is now by law allowed for any offense heretofore committed: Provided, That any midshipman now in said Naval Academy may waive his right to trial by court-martial under existing law for any offense of hazing heretofore committed and may accept punishment under the provisions of section 2 of this act.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, at the time that the rule was introduced the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself agreed to waive any debate at that time, with the understanding that the forty minutes should fall into general debate. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] in charge of the bill may proceed for twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to couple with that the request that immediately after the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] may be recognized for twenty minutes in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request granting twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York and twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object, but I gave notice a few moments ago that I desired to offer a substitute for the committee bill, and I simply wanted to offer that substitute now and let it be pending, and I would like to have it read. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the bill as reported is a substitute for the Senate bill. It seems to the Chair that the gentleman's proposition would be an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I propose to amend the bill as reported by striking out the whole bill and inserting this substitute which I offer.

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the amendment would be in order. The bill under consideration is a substitute in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that this substitute be considered as pending, and I will ask, further, unanimous consent that it may now be read, because under the rule we may not get through with the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the substitute will be read at this time.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 12, after the word "That," strike out all the remainder of the committee amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That offense known as 'hazing' may hereafter be proceeded against, dealt with, and punished as offenses against good order and discipline and the violation and breaches of the rules of said academy: Provided, That no midshipman shall be dismissed from the Naval Academy for hazing except upon conviction by court-martial, the finding and sentence of which shall be subject to review by the convening authority and by the Secretary of the Navy, as in the case of other courts-martial: Provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not apply in any case where by reason of an accumulation of demerits the midshipman, under the rules of the academy, is subject to dismissal.

"SEC. 2. That the sentence, upon conviction by court-martial, in such cases may be dismissal from the academy or such lesser penalty as may be deemed proper and adequate for the punishment of the offender and the enforcement of discipline. Such sentence and finding shall be subject to review as now provided by law in the case of trials by court-martial.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of every officer and instructor on duty at said academy to promptly report to the Superintendent of said academy all acts of hazing which may come to their knowledge or of which they have information of any kind, and for a failure to so report shall be subject to dismissal from the service of the Government.

"SEC. 4. That no midshipman dismissed upon conviction for hazing shall be eligible for reappointment to the said academy.

"SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman offers his amendment to the House substitute for the Senate bill; that it is in the nature of a motion to strike out the House substitute and insert the proposition of the gentleman. Is there objection to the request made as to twenty minutes' time to be given to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] and twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, there was appointed a subcommittee of the Naval Committee of the House—five members of which I had the honor to be the chairman, consisting of Mr. LOUD of Michigan, Mr. DAWSON of Iowa, Mr. GREGG of Texas, Mr. PADGETT of Tennessee, and myself. We went to Annapolis. We brought back, after as thorough an investigation as we could make, a unanimous report as to the finding of facts upon conditions which existed there, and as to the recommendations which we wished to make to meet those conditions. This same subcommittee, Mr. Speaker, that went to Annapolis was designated by the Naval Committee of the House to prepare and present to the committee a hazing bill which should endeavor to correct the conditions which we found at Annapolis. The subcommittee was again unanimous in reporting the bill which is now before the House, to the Naval Committee of the House, as a substitute for the Senate bill which came over to us. The action of the Naval Committee of the House upon our report was not quite unanimous. One member objected to it because, in his judgment, it was too severe. Another member objected to it because, in his judgment, it was too mild.

We therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached a conservative ground between those who desire to have extreme laws passed in either direction in regard to hazing, that we have reached a conservative and sane ground upon which this House can stand. Last November, Mr. Speaker, the country was thrown into a condition of some excitement over reports that came from Annapolis. We all admit the importance of the naval school at Annapolis. We have believed all these years that it is the best naval school in the world. We have believed all through our history that the naval officers that we have turned out of that school to take command of our ships were the best naval officers turned out to command any ships that float the ocean. We have believed all these years, and our experience whenever we have come to test it has seemed to confirm our belief in the character of the officers who graduate from that institution. It was with a good deal of concern then, Mr. Speaker, that the reports of the disturbances, the seeming lack of discipline, the outbreaks of hazing, the reports of class fighting were received by the country. Last November there was a fight which took place there called the "Branch-Meriwether fight." As an unfortunate and deplorable result of that encounter between those two young men, one of the—Branch—died. Meriwether was tried by court-martial, convicted, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment, which he is now serving out. Immediately the country became excited over it. Newspapers took it up and some of them exaggerated it. The people were led to believe that they had prize fights at Annapolis every morning before breakfast and every night after supper.

But our investigation disclosed the fact, Mr. Speaker, that only one class fight, and that was this Branch-Meriwether fight, had taken place during the present school year; that only seven fights of all kinds—that is, the ordinary encounters between these young men—have taken place during the last eighteen months. Now, Mr. Speaker, wherever a large number of boys are associated together you can not prevent personal encounters. Wherever a large number of men are gathered together you can not prevent personal encounters, and I think there are gentlemen on the floor who have seen even in this great Chamber, with our constituents looking down upon us, that personal encounters have not been unknown in the history of this House. Great indignation was felt as to the Branch-Meriwether fight, and I wish to state to the gentlemen the facts we brought out there for the first time in our investigation as to the cause of that fight. Mr. Meriwether is now serving a year's imprisonment for gross violation of regulations because, as a result of a fight with Mr. Branch, young Branch lost his life, presumably by striking his head against the wall in falling. I want to state to this House the reason for that personal encounter which took place between these young men, and I want you to pass your opinion upon that fight and I want you to pass your opinion as to whether that young man who is now serving imprisonment should not receive a full and free pardon from the President of the United States. [Applause.] There had been personal feeling between these two upper-class men, Mr. Branch and Mr. Meriwether. One evening Branch, the older of the two, went into the room of Mr. Meriwether; he saw there lying upon the table a letter which Meriwether had received from his old grandmother down in New Orleans. He saw there also a photograph that she had inclosed to her grandson. Mr. Branch came from New York City, belonged to an aristocratic social circle, a circle of wealth. The other boy belonged to a different status of life, coming up from some State in the South. Mr. Branch picked up the letter which this boy had received from his grandmother, which was written upon coarse paper, and commenced to criticise the spelling and the writing and the paper upon which it was written. He picked up the photograph, which was of dark complexion, and commenced making insinuations, referring to the color of his grandmother as disclosed in that photograph. As a result of that Mr. Meriwether asked him to fight it out man to man there between themselves, with nobody else present. Branch refused, and said he would accept a challenge in the ordinary way. The challenge was given, and the fight in which Branch lost his life was the result of that provocation given to Meriwether that evening in his room, and I say to you, gentlemen, I do not know how you may feel about it, but as for me, I say that the boy is not fit to carry his country's commission, to sail the ships of the Navy of our country, who would not resent the insult given to him on that occasion. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARRE. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. PEARRE. From whom did this come; who states these facts?

Mr. VREELAND. They were stated to us by the commandant while upon the stand, the commandant of midshipmen.

Mr. PADGETT. Captain Colvocoresses.

Mr. PEARRE. But was it stated by any eyewitness? Was anybody present at the time?

Mr. VREELAND. There was nobody present.

Mr. PEARRE. From whom did he get the facts?

Mr. VREELAND. The facts were given to us, as stated, by the commandant of midshipmen; and I will say I do not care to go into a cross-examination upon the subject. I present the statement as given to us by witnesses upon the stand, and the gentleman in his own time and in such place as he may desire can take it up further.

Mr. PEARRE. If the gentleman refuses to answer questions upon the subject, very well.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You are entirely convinced the Superintendent believes that fact?

Mr. VREELAND. Oh, there is no question about that, and the fight resulted from it. And it is understood by the boys there that those were the facts.

Mr. HOAR. Did this evidence appear at the court-martial upon which the man who was sentenced was tried?

Mr. VREELAND. It did so. The feeling throughout the country was very intense about this affair. About the 10th of December following occurred the Kimbrough case. This was a case where a young man named Kimbrough was hazed by the upper classmen for making disclosures to the board of investigation. He was compelled by these upper classmen to stand upon his head until he became unconscious, when water was dashed in his face, restoring him to his senses, and then again he was put through physical exercises until again he became unconscious and was left upon a bed. The surgeon told us that they had grave fears for his life, but they succeeded in bringing him through.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these were a few——

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. What excuse did the surgeon give for not reporting this to the Superintendent? They never told this to anybody until the investigation.

Mr. VREELAND. This case, I will say to my friend, was reported by the surgeon; because of its severity it had to be reported.

Mr. MAHON. When?

Mr. VREELAND. It was reported when discovered.

Mr. MAHON. To the Superintendent?

Mr. VREELAND. And this was the case that led to the discovery of the fact that hazing in large extent was practiced there. The discovery of the brutal hazing in this case created excitement throughout the country. Parents with boys at Annapolis became anxious; the papers, some of them, exaggerated it, and the country was of the opinion that the academy was full of these Kimbrough cases, in which boys were stood upon their heads until they were unconscious.

We found that 281 of the upper-class men are implicated in hazing in that school; but I am glad to say to you that in a great majority of those cases—in all except a few of those cases—the hazing was of a mild character, not injurious to the recipient of it. I will say, further, that in a large majority of all of these cases the hazing was trivial in its character and seemed to be the mere outbreak of boyish mischief and boyish spirit. Hence the impression throughout the country as to the character of hazing done there—the impression which existed in this House as to its character—is for the most part incorrect. The hazing in this one Kimbrough case is the only one where its severity was shown to have gone to the point of danger to the recipient of the hazing. Who is to blame for this state of affairs——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was going to ask the gentleman, before he passes from this part of his subject, as to the probable age of these upper-class men that you have spoken of. You have spoken of them as boys.

Mr. VREELAND. Of course the gentleman from Iowa will understand that the fourth class that is being hazed this year becomes the third class next year.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not asking about the hazing, but about their ages.

Mr. VREELAND. And they become the most energetic hazers in the academy. The average ages will run from 17, 18, 19, to 20 years.

Mr. HEPBURN. But the upper-class men are usually men—21 years of age?

Mr. VREELAND. First-class men are about that age.

Mr. HEPBURN. Educated men?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes, sir; in the process of being educated.

We asked the question, Who is to blame for this state of affairs? We sent to all the Members of the House a copy of the report which was made and the conclusions which we found, hoping that many of you would have time to read it and at least learn the findings of facts upon which we based our conclusions. I could not put my hand on any one man or two men or any three men, Mr. Speaker, and say that they are to blame for the state of affairs that existed at Annapolis. In my judgment, while some of the officers now connected with the institution and who have been connected with it during the last few years have been in some degree censurable for things which we have stated in our report, yet I think, on the whole, Mr. Speaker, that the changes which have been going on in that school during the past three years, without corresponding change in the methods of discipline, are mainly responsible for the conditions at Annapolis. What are those changes? During the last three or four years we have been spending $10,000,000 in putting up new buildings. That means an enormous amount of work. It means that during a part of that time these midshipmen have been quartered in different parts of the grounds. During that time also the number of midshipmen in that institution has increased from 300 to nearly 900 midshipmen, without any corresponding increase in the number of disciplinary officers. Again, in the commencement of the present school year a new Superintendent and new disciplinary officers, who knew nothing about this school from experience, came in and took charge of that institution. So I think it is plain that these changes, to which the rules of the academy have not yet been adjusted, are more than any other one thing responsible for the condition which we found there.

How could 281 boys be implicated in hazing any number of individual cases without the naval authorities of the academy finding it out? That is a fair question. That is the question which we had upon our lips when this subcommittee went to Annapolis. We were of the opinion that the officers must be to blame at least for not finding out that this hazing occurred. And yet, Mr. Speaker, by the force of the facts as represented to us we were compelled to change our minds.

Mr. PALMER. Did it appear that the Superintendent was cognizant of the fact that hazing had been carried on and that he not only knew it, but that he encouraged it as being a part of the necessary discipline of the school?

Mr. VREELAND. The former Superintendent called the boys in and got their word of honor, under some compulsion, that they would not haze. The boys construed it to mean physical hazing, and that stopped during his stay there, but other forms of hazing, fully as objectionable, or more so, prevailed to a great extent during his administration. Now, when Admiral Brownson left the school he called in the representatives of the upper-class men and said that he absolved them from their promise not to haze. We consider that an unfortunate occurrence, because the boys construed it as removing every constraint over their power to haze the under-class men.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish the gentleman would state, if he can, in a very few words, what form of hazing was indulged in, what we may call "moral" hazing, in view of the fact that they could not enforce their hazing with any physical penalty. How did they haze? I have been anxious to learn how it was done.

Mr. VREELAND. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will first answer the question as to how this hazing could go on and not necessarily be discovered by the naval officers of that institution. Nearly 900 boys are quartered in Bancroft Hall. There are 500 rooms there where these cadets are quartered. The corridors upon which these rooms open are more than a mile and a quarter in length. On account of the dormer windows in the upper stories of that building, access from one room to another is easy. To look after these 840 or 850 boys in that great building, with its mile and a quarter of corridors, was stationed one naval officer. It is evident, then, that thousands of cases, or an unlimited number of cases, of hazing could go on there daily and, unless a boy was severely injured, as in the Kimbrough case, making it necessary to take him to the hospital and report, unless that should occur the naval officer in charge never would find it out.

That brings us, gentlemen, to describe the system of discipline that prevails at Annapolis.

The theory of the Naval Academy is that these cadets shall be a self-governing body. We are educating them to be officers in the Navy. We are sending them out to take charge of ships and of the lives of our men. We feel that there they must learn the lessons of self-control; that they must learn there the lessons of putting duty first, the lesson of carrying out their duty, lead them where it may. It is evident, then, Mr. Speaker, that if we adopt a system of prison discipline at Annapolis; if we station officers there who shall actually keep these boys under their surveillance, their actual observation, and prevent hazing by standing over them, we can not graduate out of that institution men that we wish to send out to take charge of our ships and our sailors.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. VREELAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORRELL. I want to ask the gentleman how important a part he thinks discipline plays in the education of the young men in the Naval Academy?

Mr. VREELAND. I would answer my friend from Pennsylvania that, as a civilian, my opinion is that discipline is the whole basis of a military education.

Mr. MORRELL. Is it a fact that this number of boys engaged in hazing shows that there is not the kind of discipline there that is desirable?

Mr. VREELAND. It shows a lack of it. I have endeavored to describe that, in my judgment, the theory which prevails there of making the boys a self-governing body and making officers of the company responsible for the breaches of regulations is the right one.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have time to present his statement of facts to the House.

Mr. RIXEY. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that, under the rule adopted, we only have so much time.

Mr. SIBLEY. Then I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VREELAND. Let me proceed, then, and describe the discipline. Out of the upper-class men—that is, the oldest class in the academy—the disciplinary officers are appointed, who are supposed to govern the midshipmen under the direction of the naval officers. There are two in charge of each company of these midshipmen. Wherever they are, whether they are in Bancroft Hall for the night or whether they are in the mess hall at meals, wherever they are the cadet officers are supposed to be in charge of the company and report breaches of regulation and discipline to the naval authorities.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. VREELAND. I will yield to the gentleman in one moment. There must be enough supervision over the boys by the naval officers to know that the cadet officers are carrying out their duty. After the changes that have taken place with the addition of 300 per cent of the numbers at the Naval Academy, this supervision has been lacking. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the authorities at the academy have already taken what, in my judgment, are the necessary steps for enforcing the discipline in the academy in that respect. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman if the committee found that these officers of the upper classes, who are the officers of the corps, and who are supposed to maintain this discipline, as a matter of fact, did not report these breaches of discipline when they came under their knowledge?

Mr. VREELAND. That is absolutely true.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Then I would like to ask how the proposed discipline of the cadets is to be carried out if the officers who are intrusted with military duty will not report the breaches of discipline that come under their observation?

Mr. VREELAND. While the cadet officers are officers, we must still remember that they are boys getting their education. We must have over them sufficient observation by the naval officers to see that they are held up to their duty, and that they do make the reports that they ought to make.

Now, I will say to the House that the admiral who is in charge of the institution at present proposes to determine in the future whether they are carrying out their duty or whether they are not. I may say in behalf of Admiral Sands what I believe to be true, and what is concurred in by every member of the committee, that he is absolutely with Congress and with the country in the disposition to suppress hazing in that institution. I never met a man who is more opposed to hazing than is Admiral Sands. I may say that upon the first discovery that hazing existed there, when the Kimbrough case came up, that no one could have been more energetic in taking up and enforcing the law than he did in this case. He immediately convened a board of investigation, as he is authorized to do under the law. He called the fourth-class men before him and asked what had been going on and who had hazed them. The boys declined to answer. He dissolved the board and sent to the Navy Department and got the necessary orders and reconvened the board of investigation. He again called the boys before him and said to them, "We are asking you these questions under oath in the line of your duty, and if you refuse to answer you will be tried for insubordination and expelled from the academy."

One hundred and twenty-nine of these boys did answer. He found the complete history in their answers as to what had been going on in that institution. Now, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is proposed in the future at Annapolis, as has been the case at West Point for the last five years, to keep that board of investigation constantly in existence; that at irregular periods—once a month, once in two months, whenever it becomes necessary—that board will call before them these under-class men and they will put them under oath and they will find out whether the cadet officers in the institution are doing their duty.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] has just advised us that a number of these midshipmen under oath answered questions regarding hazing that had been going on.

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. My advice from the academy is that those boys who answered those questions have ever since been ostracized by the other members of their class for having answered the questions of this investigation. Is that true?

Mr. VREELAND. I will say to my friend from Illinois that Mr. Kimbrough, whose hazing I have described to the House, was ostracized because he was the boy who went in and gave the first answers, but I did not find that the statement is true as a general proposition. On the contrary, during the stay of the committee at Annapolis, the senior class in that institution, out of which the cadet officers for the next year will be appointed, voluntarily got together and adopted a resolution that they would use their offices and influence against the practice of hazing in that academy.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and that is as to whether the conditions he has described are the fault of the law or of the administration at the academy.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have been trying for the last thirty minutes to answer that question to the House.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I have not been in, and that was why I asked the question.

Mr. VREELAND. We found, as a matter of fact, that it was more due, if we name one thing that is to blame, to the changes and enlargement of the academy that have been going on and the increase from 300 to 900 boys, although some fault and some censure, as we have pointed out in our report, is due to some of the officers connected with the academy now and in the past.

Mr. WATSON. And in the opinion of the gentleman the change of the law that he suggests in this bill will largely tend to remedy the existing evil?

Mr. VREELAND. I will say this: It is the opinion of the President of the United States, of the Secretary of the Navy, of the Superintendent of the academy, of everyone connected with schools, as far as I know, that the present law on the statute books is an absurd law. It is a law which in its effect Congress never contemplated. I am unwilling to believe that the Congress of the United States ever intended to pass a hazing law which would call up a boy and try him by court-martial and dismiss him from the academy for some petty offense for which he ought to receive five or ten demerits. Yet under the definitions given by the law officers of the Government of hazing, as the law stands to-day, the Superintendent of the academy has no discretion. If we do not change the law he must start again the courts-martial, and he must try these 250 or 300 boys and expel them from that institution for these, the majority of them, trivial offenses, the result of an outbreak of boyish spirit.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what has been done with these young men who have already been tried?

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. We have endeavored to provide for this larger number who have not been tried by court-martial in this bill.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. But how about the young men who have been tried?

Mr. VREELAND. We find some constitutional point there which we have to get around. We do not undertake to change the law providing that these boys may be punished without their consent except by court-martial, as the law provided. But we have said in this law that the Superintendent may, in his discretion, with the consent and acceptance of these cadets who have committed offenses heretofore, give them punishment, under section 2 of this act, less than court-martial and dismissal. It means, in my judgment, that if this bill we have before the House becomes a law, within one week after its passage all of those cases of hazing will be disposed of and a reasonable and just amount of punishment will be inflicted, if any is deserved, in each case, each case being treated upon its merits, and that the school may then settle back to its work.

Mr. GRAFF. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. GRAFF. The gentleman from Indiana asked a question about those cases where there had been courts-martial——

Mr. VREELAND. Yes; I am glad to answer it. In the cases that have been court-martialed we found it impossible to deal with in this general law, because there are so many different conditions. Some of them have been expelled by court-martial. We believe they ought to have been expelled, and we believe they should have received punishment beyond being sent away from that school. Others have been dismissed by court-martial; and I may mention Decatur, a family famous for generations in the Navy of our country, who was expelled for hazing, of such character as, in my judgment, after reading the testimony, does not entitle him to dismissal from that institution. Others are in the same situation. Others have been tried and convicted, and sentence has been suspended by the President. So that the gentlemen will see the difficulty of dealing in a general way with these cases. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I have filed a very short statement of my views upon the substitute for and the pending bill itself. There are two essential questions involved in this matter. First, whether court-martials shall be had for trial of offenses against discipline at the academy. Second, the character of punishment which ought to be meted out to those violating the laws and committing serious offenses. I agree with the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat upon the importance of permitting the officers at the academy to exercise ample disciplinary powers. I believe the boys at the Naval Academy should be altogether under the control of its authorities, subject to review by the Secretary of the Navy and the approval of the President. I do not believe that a boy at the Naval Academy, who grossly violates the laws of that academy ought to be any more entitled before he is dismissed to a trial under court-martial than I would believe that a student at any of the great universities of this land ought to be entitled to a trial by a jury in the courts of the country before being dismissed by the authorities of that university. Under the present law the authorities can not dismiss for hazing, but in every case when the authorities desire dismissal for hazing a court-martial must be held and the boys must be tried and convicted before dismissal. I agree with the majority of the committee that that is cumbersome, expensive, demoralizing, and unnecessary. I have been unable to see the wisdom of the proposed bill, which will prevent the authorities, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy and the President, from dismissing a midshipman for a single act of cruel and barbarous hazing except after a court-martial trial.

My theory is that the authorities there ought to have complete power over dismissals from the academy, subject to approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and if when they exercise that power of dismissal they deem the offense so severe that a court-martial ought to be held for further punishment, then in addition to dismissal permit the authorities to have a court-martial for the purpose of inflicting a further punishment, and not for the purpose of ascertaining whether the boy ought to be dismissed or not. Now, let us consider the punishment. As the law now stands the cadet who is adjudged guilty of hazing of any degree must be dismissed. I am frank to say I believe dismissal is too severe a punishment for all cases of hazing, because there may be cases of hazing where there is no injury and no brutality, cruelty, or tyranny exercised, for which demerits would be sufficient punishment; therefore I am not insisting that the cadet should be dismissed for every offense of hazing. But since the law now dismisses for every offense of hazing, I believe we should go no further in modifying that law than to say that midshipmen for trifling offenses may be subject to punishment by demerits; but I believe we ought to retain in the law the mandatory provision that every case of cruel or barbarous hazing should still be punished by dismissal. Now, that is the main difference between the major [illegible] of the committee and myself, as I understand it. In other words, the bill they propose permits the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, with approval of the Secretary of the Navy, to expel a boy whenever for other reasons than hazing his continued presence there is contrary to the good of the service.

It goes further: for repeated offense of hazing, whether cruel or not, as I understand it, the Superintendent of the academy would have this power of dismissal. But though he deems it wise for a boy to be dismissed for a single offense of hazing, however cruel or brutal, he can not dismiss him, but can only call for a court-martial, and, Mr. Speaker, it is not mandatory upon the court-martial in case they find the man guilty of cruel or barbarous hazing to dismiss him. But the bill leaves it to the discretion of the court-martial to inflict demerits upon him, or expel him or fix a severer punishment. Now, this court-martial may be composed of gentleman who have attended the academy, and who may have themselves been guilty of hazing in their early days, and their sympathies may be with the practices which still prevail. Would you expect a court-martial in sympathy with the practice to expel a man for a single offense of hazing, when maybe they have been themselves guilty of the same offense in their training days, and were not expelled and were not punished?

I believe that Congress ought to say that in every case of cruel, barbarous, or brutal hazing, the penalty shall be dismissal. When you say that, then there comes the question whether you will leave it to the authorities of the academy to dismiss or whether you make a law requiring a court-martial in such case. I believe the academy authorities, with the approval of the Secretary and the President, ought to have that power. It does not occur to me that this would apply to personal encounters as distinguished from class fighting.

Although a personal encounter might result in cruelty, I would not designate that as hazing, while class fighting is usually hazing. The excellent report filed upon hazing by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] and his subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs goes into this question. The country, I presume, and all people who have read his report, certainly understand what hazing is. Under the amendment which I shall propose, if two midshipmen should suddenly become provoked and engage in a fist fight they would not be subject to dismissal on account of hazing.

As long as boys grow into men these personal difficulties will occur. It is a very different thing from the class fight that occurs as the result of hazing at the academy. Why, as it stands now, if one of these fourth-class men should refuse to obey a superior classman and then refuse to be hazed for it, what follows? A class fight. And with whom shall he fight? Why, they select an athlete in the class to beat him. They select a man, not such as will give him a fair fight with equal show of victory, but in order to beat that lower-class man and thus compel other lower-class men to submit to them they select one they think can whip him. If by chance that young man whips the old one in that fight, the young man must still fight another old man, and they pursue him in that manner until some old man is found who can whip him. For such as that, expulsion, in my judgment, should be the lowest punishment. [Loud applause.] Right here permit me to say that I do not share the views entertained by Admiral Sands and incorporated in the report of the gentleman from New York, to which I have just now referred, that a man who submits to the hazing is a coward. I do not believe it. I do not believe it is a badge of cowardice when a young man knows that under the prevailing custom he will be whipped, perhaps unmercifully whipped, being compelled to fight with older men, for him to use that discretion which is the better part of valor and submit to hazing. You might as well say that a band of a thousand men, though they might be as brave as the Greeks at Thermopylæ or the Texans at the Alamo, when they come into contact with a superior force of ten thousand as brave as they, are cowards unless they rush to deliberate death unnecessarily. To court certain defeat is not essential to courage. Our civilization and common sense recognize no such test of courage. It is not always cowardice for one who has no chance of success to refuse to fight upon unequal terms, knowing that it must result in his humiliation. I enter my dissent from the views expressed by Admiral Sands upon the man who submits to hazing.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this House should meet its duty and let the cadets and the country know that it is the sense of Congress that when a midshipman engages in brutal and cruel hazing he shall be dismissed. I believe that if this bill is properly amended it will be a vast improvement over the present law; but, in my judgment, if this bill is passed as it is presented in this body without the amendments, it will be a great encouragement to hazing as compared with the present law. I believe it will tend, as I say in my views, to diminish the discouragement which the present law presents.

I suggest that in the first section of the substitute, after the word "service," we should add this:

Or shall believe him guilty of cruel or brutal hazing.

So that when the Superintendent of the academy believes that a midshipman should leave there on account of conduct generally, or shall believe him guilty of cruel or brutal hazing, he shall proceed as the balance of the section provides, to state the facts and his reasons to the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy shall call upon that midshipman to answer in writing or otherwise, and that with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy the Superintendent may dismiss him. I believe it is essential to the proper discouragement of hazing at that academy that some such expression as is intended by this amendment shall be incorporated into this bill.

Second, I shall move to strike out the last sentence of section 2. The last sentence is this:

But no midshipman shall be dismissed for a single act of hazing, except under section 3—

Which provides for a court-martial. I do not believe that the Superintendent should be required, before dismissing a man for a single act of cruel and barbarous treatment of another, to resort to the cumbersome, expensive, and demoralizing methods of a court-martial for a boy who in his youth is being trained for the duties of life.

The other two amendments that I suggest are really to perfect those that I have already mentioned, and need not be discussed here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, these boys who attend the United States Naval Academy, with fair compensation while they are there, receiving their training at public expense, and who have before them the great opportunities which graduation holds out to them, should be impressed every day and in every instance with their duty to obey the regulations of that academy and the laws of their country, and I believe they should be impressed with their duty to abstain from cruel and tyrannous treatment toward every man, whether he is at the academy now or shall be under them in after life, who is of less fortunate station than they. And, Mr. Speaker, while those of us who have midshipmen there that may be involved in this hazing, and who may receive communications from the kins people and friends of the midshipmen, may wish to look with leniency upon hazing and may wish to let it prevail without serious effect upon the individuals who perpetrate it, yet, in my opinion, the great people of the country, who support that institution and who are no friends of cruel tyranny, but who believe in humanity and justice, and who believe that when the sons of other people go to that institution they should receive fair treatment, not only at the hands of the Government and of the faculty, but at the hands of other midshipmen, would, I believe, favor continuing the present law on the statute book rather than so greatly mollify the punishment now provided by law, as is proposed in the pending bill if unamended.

Having expressed my views concerning the amendments which I think ought to be added to this bill, I shall now yield the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent, if the gentleman will propose an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The reading of the bill has not commenced. That is the reason I have asked unanimous consent. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The reading has not commenced. The Clerk will read the first section.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendments to which I have referred, and to have them considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy, whenever he shall believe the continued presence of any midshipman at the said academy to be contrary to the best interests of the service, to report in writing such fact, with a full statement of his reasons for such belief, to the Secretary of the Navy, who, if after due consideration of the said report he shall deem the superintendent's said belief reasonable and well founded, shall cause a copy of the said report to be served upon the said midshipman and require the said midshipman to show cause, in writing and within such time as the said Secretary shall deem reasonable, why he should not be dismissed from the said academy; and after due consideration of any cause so shown the said Secretary may, in his discretion, but with the written approval of the President, dismiss such midshipman from the said academy.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 15, after the word "service," insert "or shall believe him to be guilty of cruel or brutal hazing."

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the whole section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the amendment now is in the second degree.

Mr. DAWSON. Would it not be better for the gentleman from North Carolina to wait and offer his amendment when the section is reached to which it applies?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The section has been read.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. There has been twenty minutes' debate on a side for and against the bill. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia at this time and then will recognize the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. SMITH, after that.

Mr. VREELAND. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VREELAND. We are now reading the bill by sections and proceeding to debate it under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Under the five-minute rule. The first section of the substitute has been read.

Mr. VREELAND. And at the conclusion of the discussion the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina will be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I desired under the general debate to say a word or two in regard to the substitute which I offered. I did not have that opportunity. I will take this occasion to explain it briefly. As I understand the condition at the Naval Academy, it is that about 300 young men are guilty of hazing; that it is the opinion of the authorities that a very small minority ought to be dismissed and the balance of them, instead of going scot-free, ought to be punished with demerits. I believe that any law brought in here ought to recognize that condition, and ought to recognize that the same condition will probably prevail in the future, and make provision for punishing the minor cases, so that they can be dealt with by the Superintendent. But whenever it is the purpose to dismiss any cadet because he has been guilty of brutal hazing or any other conduct for which he ought not to remain at the academy, then the midshipman ought to have an opportunity to be confronted by his accusers, that he ought to have a right to see the witnesses, that he ought to have a right to have his witnesses, and that can only be done by a court-martial.

This ought to be given him because he has chosen a military career for his life work, and if it is to be cut short, if he is to be dismissed in disgrace from the academy, it is as little as this Government can do to afford to him a fair opportunity to be heard, that he may not be unjustly dismissed without a hearing. That is one object, I think, which ought to be accomplished.

The bill that I introduced provides in the first section that all cases of hazing may be proceeded against and dealt with and punished as offenses against good order and discipline, except when the midshipman is to be dismissed, when he is entitled to a court-martial. The second section provides for court-martial where he is to be dismissed.

The third provides that the officer at the academy who has been cognizant of the hazing and fails to report it shall be dismissed from the academy, and I believe that every Member of the House will think that that is right and proper. If you are going to punish the cadets by dismissal for an offense of hazing, certainly the man who, if he had not actually encouraged it, has known of it and failed to report it and rebuke it should be punished by dismissal. The fourth section provides that wherever a cadet, after a fair trial by court-martial, has been adjudged guilty of brutal act of hazing and dismissed from the academy he shall not be eligible to reappointment.

This is the whole bill I have introduced. It deals in nothing except hazing. It provides, in brief, that all hazing shall be dealt with by the authorities at the academy without a court-martial except in the case where the conduct of the midshipman merits dismissal, and in that case the midshipman is entitled to a trial by court-martial.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina. The amendment, it seems to me, is entirely out of place in regard to section 1. I will support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], which is to strike out of this bill the whole of section 1. That section was not intended to refer to hazing at all, but more especially to cases now dealt with under other regulations. The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina ought not to be adopted.

But I would support the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] to strike out this section, and for the reasons given. It does not concern hazing or treat with it. Hazing is provided for by the second section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, the first section of this bill provides as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy, whenever he shall believe the continued presence of any midshipman at the said academy to be contrary to the best interests of the service, to report in writing such fact, with a full statement of his reasons for such belief, to the Secretary of the Navy, who, if after due consideration of the said report he shall deem the superintendent's said belief reasonable and well founded, shall cause a copy of the said report to be served upon the said midshipman and require the said midshipman to show cause, in writing and within such time as the said Secretary shall deem reasonable, why he should not be dismissed from the said academy; and after due consideration of any cause so shown the said Secretary may, in his discretion, but with the written approval of the President, dismiss such midshipman from the said academy.

Now, this section, which has no special application to hazing, provides that in any case wherever the Superintendent of the Academy is of opinion that the continued presence of a mid-shipman is not for the best interests of the service he shall report that fact, with his reasons, to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall forward a copy of these charges to the midshipman, who is to reply in writing. No opportunity is given to the midshipman to furnish his witnesses; no opportunity is given to him to be present before the Secretary of the Navy; no opportunity is given him to be heard except in a written communication, which he may file from Annapolis. No opportunity is given to be represented by counsel. I say that a more arbitrary mode of procedure, it seems to me, could not be invented. It is one absolutely unjust to the midshipman that he should be disposed of in this summary way, and what will be the effect of it? Why, when he is reported here to the Secretary of the Navy, the midshipman who has powerful political influence will have it brought to bear upon the Secretary of the Navy, but if there is a midshipman there without much influence he may perhaps be condemned, tried, dismissed, where the man who had committed a greater offense would be retained. It does seem to me that this power of the Secretary of the Navy is an unusual power. It is unjust. The Secretary of the Navy is to decide whether to dismiss the boy. The only man who has access to the Secretary of the Navy is the Superintendent at the academy. He can prosecute before the Secretary the case against the midshipman, but the boy can not be heard in person to present his own defense, or be confronted with the witnesses against him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I concur that there should be amendment to the existing law with reference to hazing at both the military and the naval academies. But I am not able to reach the conclusion that the amendment, which has been prepared with great care and every effort to do the proper thing by the committee, would be a benefit; and while I can not hope that this bill will be defeated, I do wish to enter my protest against its passage and state my reasons briefly therefor. Five years ago it was my privilege to serve on the special committee of this House that investigated hazing at the West Point Military Academy. We discovered there were more than 100 separate forms of hazing used there, extending from the most brutal to the most trivial. That committee recommended to this House a law which put a distinction between the serious and the trivial and inferior offenses. It proposed to this House that class fighting and physical exercising should be punished by expulsion, and that all other forms of hazing should be suppressed at the academy under such regulations as might be prescribed.

That provision was put upon the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the Military Academy in conference, but voted down in the Senate, and there was imposed upon the country a law which made no distinction between the most heinous and the most trifling offenses. That law was against my judgment then, and it is against my judgment now. But while I thus fully concur with the Committee on Naval Affairs upon this subject, I desire to call attention to the fact that during that investigation it developed that the discipline at the academy was destroyed because the Superintendent of the academy had to transmit his recommendation to the Secretary of War, and immediately Members of Congress and Senators commenced to besiege the Secretary of War not to impose so severe a penalty as that recommended by the Superintendent of the academy.

The Secretary of War would finally write that he thought the recommendation was too severe and direct the Superintendent to recommend a lighter punishment, and the Superintendent had to do that, and all discipline at the academy was destroyed by this political intermeddling. There seemed to be but two ways in which we could avoid that difficulty. One was to make the punishment absolute; to put it beyond the control of any political official. The other was to make the action of the Superintendent of the academy absolutely final, without approval by the Secretary of War or by the President. I know of no way that this abuse can be avoided except these two.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Most certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. What I want is light. As a practical instructor of young men for several years, this question has presented itself to me in these discussions here: Why is it that with hundreds of institutions of learning—thousands of them, all over the country—where from five hundred to three or four thousand young men are matriculated, and where they have no authority of law except such authority as is given to the officers of the institution—purely civil authority—that you have no trouble about hazing—none to mention—and that in this little academy, with a few hundred very young boys and with absolute authority given to old Army officers to control them, it takes the whole United States and Congress combined to run that little school?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman that, in my judgment, if the authorities at the academy, like the authorities at colleges and universities, had the right to run these academies uninterfered with by political influence, by Congressmen, Senators, and Departments at Washington, discipline could and would be maintained there. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY. I agree with you.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And whenever you leave this thing so that first the punishment shall be discretionary and then that discretion be vested in political officials you will have no discipline at West Point and you will have no discipline at Annapolis.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for an extension of time for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. My objection to this bill is that in every practical respect it restores the law exactly to the condition that existed prior to the investigation at West Point five years ago. There is no material change from the then-existing law if this bill be enacted.

Mr. LACEY. Was not the law at Annapolis changed in 1903?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The law in 1903 was changed at Annapolis, making it identical with the law enacted in 1901 in reference to West Point, and that is the only change.

Mr. MAHON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. Was there any serious trouble at Annapolis until three cadets were court-martialed some years ago and turned out of the service and a bill was introduced in this House and persisted in session after session and finally passed authorizing the President to restore these cadets and breaking down the discipline of that school?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think the action of Congress in that respect was ill advised and against the discipline of that academy. That is not all. This bill proposes to restore the political interference through the Secretary of the Navy and the President of the United States. I quite understand the ability of the present President or the present Secretary of the Navy to withstand that pressure, but I do insist that you are going to restore the very system under which hazing grew to be a great abuse at both the Military Academy and the Naval Academy, and that while we ought to amend the law passed in 1901 for the Military Academy and in 1903 for the Naval Academy making a distinction between a heinous and a trifling offense, the time has not arrived to go back to that identical system under which this evil grew to its worst height in both academies.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if in his judgment a violation of the oath to obey the laws and the regulations is not a very heinous offense?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is a very heinous offense.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And is it not true any hazing involves the violation of the oath?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think it does. It has not been so interpreted at the academies. I want to say further that any law that does not say that absolute and specific punishment to be meted out shall be binding upon political officials should leave the discipline in the hands of the Superintendent of the academy, and if it does not will be destructive of every effort for the suppression of hazing at these two great national institutions.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows of any tribunal in the world that is more absolutely incompetent to judge this question correctly than the Federal Congress? We have had no experience in the teaching of schools, and if these men at the academies are competent, it strikes me they ought to have the right to judge, and if they are not competent then we should get men who are. We ourselves here do not know anything about it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have but one further suggestion to make, Mr. Speaker, and that is I think our whole mistake lies in assuming that hazing should be treated as a criminal offense in place of treating it as a breach of school discipline. These academies are schools. That rule of the common law that the master of a school is in loco parentis should be regarded here. The discipline of the academy should be within the control of the academy and not within the control of any political cabinet officer in the city of Washington, and when you say that you will not let these superintendents control these academies you are doing the same thing to the discipline of these academies that you would do in your public schools if you should say we will entertain appeals from the teacher to the principal and from the principal to the superintendent and from the superintendent to a political school board, and everywhere you do that your discipline breaks down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just a moment more, if you please. General Sheridan said, in speaking on this subject, that while at West Point in the Military Academy he was subjected to the usual course of hazing there, and "while I do not know that it has inflicted upon me any permanent injury, it is a brutal custom which it is to be hoped advancing civilization will eradicate." I only ask that while amending the existing law you do not restore the condition that prevailed in 1901 at West Point and Annapolis, but pass such a law as will suppress this brutal practice. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, who is for the bill and is a member of the committee—of the subcommittee—is recognized.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, the House has listened with a great deal of interest to my distinguished colleague from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], and what he says is entitled to great consideration here not only because of his service on the hazing committee at West Point five years ago, but perhaps for another reason, because he is a member of the great Committee on Appropriations, which has had considerable experience in the matter of hazing in this House for the last two days. [Laughter.] I think the gentleman, my distinguished colleague from Iowa, has not done our committee the honor to digest the bill which is before the House at the present time. If he will direct his attention to the second section of the bill, he will find that "Hazing may hereafter be proceeded against, dealt with, and punished as offenses against good order and discipline, and for violation and breaches of the rules of the academy." That section places it distinctly and absolutely in the hands of the Superintendent to deal with hazing up to a certain point. How would he exercise the power conveyed by that section—by applying demerits? He can apply for a mild case of hazing 10 demerits, or 20 demerits, or 50 demerits, or 100 demerits. Under the regulation a certain number of demerits subjects the boy to the liability of dismissal. With the demerit system in his hands, there is no reason on earth why he can not deal with the question of hazing on the demerit system, and when a midshipman has exceeded the number of demerits to which he is entitled under the regulations he is liable to go out of the academy on acount of deficiency in conduct.

But this bill provides that for a single instance of hazing a court-martial shall be invoked. Why is that so? That should be taken into consideration along with that which follows in section 3 of the bill. If one single instance of hazing is brutal enough and cruel enough to warrant dismissal, may it not also be brutal enough and cruel enough to warrant additional punishment beyond dismissal? In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the midshipman who hazed Midshipman Kimbrough almost to death was not sufficiently punished by being dismissed from the academy. Take the single instance of hazing to which my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHEN] objects. Let the midshipman be summoned before a court-martial, and if that is an instance which merits dismissal, or if it is an instance which merits more than dismissal, this bill carries with it the right of a court-martial not only to dismiss, but to inflict such additional and further punishment as, in its judgment, will fit the case.

My colleague from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] objects to any discretion being lodged with the Secretary of the Navy in these matters. This committee, after considering this subject for many weeks, has brought in this bill. It has gone as far as it thought it could go in leaving the discipline of the academy in the hands of the Superintendent; and all of us must recognize that the Superintendent of the academy is an inferior officer in rank to the Secretary of the Navy; that whatever he may do under existing law the Secretary of the Navy has the right to review. Then I say why not place the responsibility along with the power? Whether that power rests with the Superintendent, whether it rests with the Secretary of the Navy, or whether it rests with the President of the United States, the responsibility in the last instance falls upon the Secretary of the Navy, because he can supervise the action of the Superintendent, and, on the other hand, if the matter goes to the President, it is customary for him to take the advice of the Secretary of the Navy.

So it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in the preparation of this bill we have placed the responsibility along with the power.

Now, one word about the amendments proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY]. It is only fair to this House to say that these amendments were offered in the committee, carefully considered not only by the subcommittee, but by the full Committee on Naval Affairs, and in the wisdom of that committee the bill was reported in its present form. [Loud applause.]

The urgent need for corrective legislation on the subject of hazing is clearly set forth in a letter written by President Roosevelt to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House. He outlines the present situation, and calls attention to the dangers of a continuance of the laws on this subject as they now stand. His letter states the case so succinctly as to leave no doubt as to the need of legislation, and this bill, which the committee presents to the House after weeks of patient examination and study, will, we believe, fully meet the situation.

The President's letter is as follows:

WHITE HOUSE, Washington, February 1, 1906.

SIR: I have directed that a pardon be issued to John Paul Miller, a midshipman at the United States Naval Academy, recently convicted of "hazing" and sentenced to dismissal from the academy. In the discussion of this case my attention has been called forcibly to the unsatisfactory condition of the law on this subject. A midshipman accused of hazing, whether the extent of his offense be great or small, must be tried by court-martial. The findings of such a court, if approved by the Superintendent of the academy, are declared final and can not be reviewed by the Secretary of the Navy or even by me, and neither the court itself nor the Superintendent nor the Secretary of the Navy has any discretion as to the punishment to be imposed. It is declared that in all cases of conviction the offender shall be dismissed and be ineligible for appointment as a commisioned officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during a specified time. These provisions of law seem to me neither just nor judicious, and I am seriously concerned at the injury which I fear may be done to the discipline of the academy and even to the future efficiency of the Navy if they are permitted to remain in force without amendment. I heartily disapprove of the practice of hazing, and, in common with all those interested in the welfare of the academy, wish to see this practice thoroughly eradicated there. But the punishment of dismissal is altogether disproportionate to the culpability involved in some forms of hazing. In many cases these amount to nothing more than exhibitions of boyish mischief, attended with no consequence of any moment to those hazed, and indicating on the part of the hazers only some exuberance of animal spirits. Unquestionably they ought to be punished, for under any circumstances hazing constitutes a breach of the rules, and the future officers of our Navy must be taught, first of all and as a foundation for all other merits, strict and unquestioning obedience. But to punish these faults of youth by depriving the young man concerned of his career in life is to commit a glaring injustice. Moreover, it frequently defeats the object of the law itself by causing the offender's fault to be forgotten in the sympathy felt for his misfortune, so that it becomes hard to get a conviction, and when one is obtained the pressure is very great on Congress to pass a law restoring the offender. In addition, this disproportionate punishment of what may be a trivial offense may result in depriving the Government of a promising officer on whose education it has already expended several thousands of dollars. I do not mean that dismissal is too severe a penalty for any form of hazing; on the contrary, when hazing is a mere pretext for brutality and involves cruel and ignominious treatment of the less experienced and therefore more helpless midshipman, I should be glad to see it punished even more severely. But it seems clear to me that to impose dismissal as the one invariable penalty for the offense, without any regard to the attendant circumstances, is altogether indefensible. In the case of Midshipman Miller, the Navy Department, in recommending his pardon, expressed the opinion that he ought to be punished, but that to punish him with dismissal would be a greater injustice, under the circumstances of his case, than to let him go unpunished altogether. I share this opinion, and it has dictated my course in this instance.

I think, further, that it is an error to try midshipmen accused of hazing by court-martial. There should be a discretionary power lodged in some administrative officer or body to deal summarily with such offenses. In none of our colleges or universities is it considered necessary that a student, whose conduct is unsatisfactory and who is believed to be an injury to other students, should be found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt by judicial tribunal of an offense stated and established with technical accuracy before he can be separated from the institution. Such a requirement would be disastrous to the good order and discipline of a college or university, and there is even greater likelihood of its producing these unfortunate results at our academy. Whether this discretionary authority should be intrusted to the Secretary of the Navy or to the Superintendent, subject to the Secretary's approval, or to the academic council, with the like proviso, is of altogether subordinate importance. What seems to me of real moment and no less real urgency is that it should be lodged somewhere, and that the present cumbrous, uncertain, and otherwise highly objectionable method of enforcing the law against this particular offense should be done away with. I see no objection, however, to the Department's being allowed, in its discretion, to try midshipmen at the academy by court-martial for hazing or other offenses, if by reason of peculiar circumstances the Secretary of the Navy should think this course proper to attain the ends of justice.

I have written to you thus fully and frankly because I learn that there is under consideration by your committee a bill, or perhaps several bills, intended to remedy the present very unsatisfactory condition of the law. I express no opinion as to any matters of detail connected with this suggested legislation, but I would see with much regret the present session of Congress end without some remedy being found for a situation full of embarrassment for the Navy Department and of danger for the best interests of the Navy.

Very truly, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted upon this amendment. A formal amendment can be offered. A motion to strike out the last word is in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

When will it be in order to offer an additional section to the present one, to come in as section 1½?

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending to this section.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will it be in order before the amendments to this section are disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will not. When the section is finished an additional section might be offered.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, the matter before the House is the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] to the first section of the bill. Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, objects to this bill because it is too severe. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], who is also a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, objects to the bill because it is not severe enough; and notwithstanding the position of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the bill is not drastic enough, the effect of the very first amendment which he offers will be to make it less drastic. He objects to the law because it modifies too much the existing law, and he then offers an amendment the effect of which will be to further modify existing law.

I think I can demonstrate that. Under the first section the only penalty that can be inflicted is dismissal, and even the ineligibility to reappointment is not attached to that. Now the first section provides that whenever the Superintendent of the Naval Academy shall believe the continued presence of any midshipman at said academy to be contrary to the best interests of the service, he shall be dismissed.

Now the gentleman wants to add, after the word "service," the following:

Or shall believe him guilty of cruel or brutal hazing.

Under that amendment he may be dismissed for the most cruel and brutal hazing and be reappointed by the Congressman who appointed him the next day after his dismissal. This bill provides that when guilty of brutal and cruel hazing the midshipman shall be dismissed, and shall be ineligible for reappointment, and may, by the sentence of the court-martial, be imprisoned for not more than one year.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. May I interrupt the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Texas has evidently overlooked my further amendment—No. 3—in which I say that in addition to the provisions of section 1, everything that is provided by section 3 shall apply in the case of cruel and brutal hazing. That is an additional remedy.

Mr. GREGG. Which amendment is that?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. You have overlooked my amendment No. 3, in which, under the bill as I propose to amend it, every clause amended, every clause of section 3 will apply in the case of cruel and brutal hazing, although he may be dismissed for it under my proposition.

Mr. GREGG. I will get to that in a moment. Now, in line 8, on page 6, this bill provides that in cases of brutal and cruel hazing, in addition to dismissal, such midshipmen shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year. Now, as the bill in other sections provides the machinery and the punishment to be inflicted under the machinery for cruel and brutal hazing, why put this amendment in section 1 that has no special reference to hazing?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Under your section as it now stands that court-martial might punish cruel and brutal hazing with demerits. Your bill does not require a dismissal. My amendment would require dismissal for cruel and brutal hazing, and in addition to that, if the Superintendent, in his discretion, thought it wise to have a court-martial for the further punishment, he could do so.

[The time of Mr. GREGG having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. GREGG. The trouble with the gentleman's amendment is that it is to section 1, which has no special reference to dismissal for hazing.

Now, I will explain why that section was made necessary at all in this bill. It is because there exists a question to-day whether the Secretary of the Navy has the right to expel a midshipman for any cause without a court-martial. That question is before the courts. A midshipman was discharged from the academy. He employed counsel, and his counsel takes the position in his case in court that the Secretary can not discharge for any cause without a court-martial.

Now, while we believed that the Government's contention will be upheld in that case, still we thought it wise and best to put it beyond all cavil and all possibility of doubt. Therefore we provided clearly that he should have the authority, so that there will be hereafter no question about it. That is all that section undertakes to deal with. It does not deal especially with hazing, it only meets the outside conditions, which apply to all questions of discipline at the academy. As that section deals with that phase of the case and not with the question of hazing, it occurs to me that it is unnecessary to encumber it with any provision like this amendment which is offered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that certain gentlemen do not properly consider the gravity of the subject under consideration. I have heard gentlemen in conversation say, in discussing this matter, that "boys would be boys;" that you could not "make old men out of boys." I have heard others express the opinion that the same rules, the same procedure, the same consideration for boys' pranks that are authorized and permitted in the colleges ought to obtain in this national institution. I regard the instruction and the lesson in the way of self-control, obedience, discipline, preparation for the control and discipline of the men who may be under them at a later time as the most important feature of all the educational features connected with this institution.

Let me call your attention to the statute:

The commanders of all fleets, squadrons, naval stations, and vessels belonging to the Navy are required to show in themselves a good example of virtue, honor, patriotism, and subordination; to be vigilant in inspecting the conduct of all persons who are under their command; to aid in the suppression of dissolute and immoral practices, and to correct, according to the laws and regulations of the Navy, all persons who are guilty of them; and any commander who offends against this article shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

The officers of the Navy are charged with the discipline of the Navy, and everyone who has given any thought to the subject knows that the efficiency of our Navy is not to be found alone in the caliber of our guns or in the impregnable character of their armor, but it is in the men who man these ships, who have control over these guns. It is the discipline that is maintained in the Navy that makes it efficient, or the lack of discipline that makes it a thing to be sneered at.

Now, we send these young men to the academy, not simply for the purpose of learning how to handle a ship, how to direct the guns, to familiarize themselves with the use of projectiles, but we send them there for another and more important purpose, namely, that of being so educated, so formed mentally and morally, that they can exercise the proper influence over those who in later periods of life they will command, recognizing that their efficiency is in this latter direction rather than in any other. How can you expect men to be fitted to discipline others, to secure proper subordination, to secure proper obedience to commands, when they themselves during their whole academic life are in rebellion against the laws of the country. [Applause.] Instead of its being a proper school it is the worst possible one for them.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the hammer is about to descend, and I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, for thirty-two years this Congress has been striving to secure obedience upon the part of those young gentlemen at the Naval Academy with reference to the matter of hazing. Thirty-two years ago a law was enacted with regard to this offense, and let me here say that the punishment was just what certain gentlemen now are demanding. Expulsion was not compulsory upon conviction, because the courts-martial have a right to fix another punishment or to make another recommendation than that of dismissal.

Mr. LACEY. Under what statute was that?

Mr. HEPBURN. Under the act of 1874.

Mr. LACEY. My friend is mistaken about that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have read it. I have it before me.

Mr. LACEY. The act of 1874 provided that a man dismissed should never be restored.

Mr. HEPBURN. I said nothing about that.

Mr. LACEY. The trouble is that my friend was not reading the correct statute. He was not reading the statute against hazing. There is a separate statute against hazing which provides a punishment of dismissal and no other, and in that case perpetual ineligibility to restoration to Annapolis.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the act of 1903.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, no; the act of 1903 limits the disability to two years. My friend has got hold of the wrong statute. His argument is admirable in everything if it were based on the right statute. But it has no application.

Mr. HEPBURN. I read:

That in all cases when it shall come to the knowledge of the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, at Annapolis, that any cadet midshipman or cadet engineer has been guilty of the offense commonly known as "hazing," it shall be the duty of said Superintendent to order a court-martial, composed of not less than three commissioned officers, who shall minutely examine into all the facts and circumstances of the case and make a finding thereon; and any cadet midshipman or cadet engineer found guilty of said offense by said court shall, upon recommendation of said court, be dismissed.

That is the statute of 1874.

Mr. LACEY. But my friend has not read all of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am not content to take my friend as an authority upon this subject. I followed him once, and I believe that the lamentable condition—the condition of mutiny—that now exists in that academy is largely due to the mistaken clemency that the persistent efforts of my colleague induced this House to indulge in. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we tried again in 1903——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; but I have only a moment or two.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes longer, because the gentleman is making a very interesting and able speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has two minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to examine the subject very much, but I have an idea that the difficulty, or one of the difficulties, involved is the indefiniteness of the offenses covered by the term "hazing," and I would like to have the gentleman from Iowa give, if he can, what has been held upon that subject.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am not able to give anything more than the statute. The definition that is found in the bill that we are now considering would certainly meet my approval as a proper definition of this offense.

Mr. Speaker, we tried again in 1903 and passed another statute, a portion of which I shall read:

And provided further, That the Superintendent of the Naval Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing; and any cadet found guilty of participating in or encouraging or countenancing such practice shall be summarily expelled from the academy and shall not thereafter be reappointed to the corps of cadets or be eligible for appointment as a commissioned officer in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps until two years after the graduation of the class of which he was a member.

What is the result of that? Why, we are told that these same young men have contemptuously, in the face of that statute, without the slightest regard to it, indulged in the practice far more, so far as I am advised, than ever before, and the chairman of the subcommittee tells us that there are more than 200 of these men who are guilty of this offense.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, I would rather not be interrupted, if the gentleman will allow me to proceed. Let me further suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these are not boys; they are men. These offenses are committed by the highest class men; they are not committed by the younger class; they are persons whose ages are from twenty to twenty-two and three and four. They are men who have had three years of tutelage there. They are men who have had every opportunity to know something about the real spirit that ought to animate them. They ought to know something by this time of the higher duties that are imposed upon them—the duty of maintaining discipline. That is the chief object, the most important thing that comes within the limits of their duties and authority, so that I have none of this mawkish sympathy that is indulged in by certain gentlemen here for the "boys" and for the "pranks of boys." It is not a mere prank of a boy to indulge in hazing. It is a violation of the law of the land, a law that he is familiar with, for if there is any statute of this nation that is known to all these young men it is this statute reprobating that conduct, and so it is not to be considered as a mere prank, a matter of wanton playfulness. It is a considered, deliberate defiance of authority. It is a refusal to be obedient. It is a refusal to recognize discipline. It is a refusal to fit themselves for the discharge of the higher duties that are to be incumbent upon them. Gentlemen say that it is a hardship to dismiss these men. Is it not better to dismiss them now than to allow them by their laxity and by their unfitness to corrupt the men who may be under their command later on, and to make inefficient a ship? What is it that made inefficient the navy of the Russians in their late war? Every newspaper told us it was because of the want of discipline upon those vessels, the refusal to obey lawful authority, that the men in charge were incapable of this higher duty that was imposed upon them. Therefore I think that instead of its being a calamity to dismiss all of these men it will be a future blessing to the service and of incalculable benefit to the country at large if it does serve the purpose of impressing upon those who remain the primary duty for which the Government is expending thousands of dollars that are necessary to convert mere boys into proper naval commanders, charged with the grave responsibility of the honor and supremacy of their country. Mr. Speaker, there is need of discipline in the Navy. I read a list some five years ago to this House of twenty-six vessels that had been cast away or substantially ruined since the close of the rebellion. In twenty-five years twenty-six vessels had been destroyed!

Look at the list of casualties to our vessels now. A squadron going out of the harbor of New York, with which the naval officers ought to be familiar; what a calamitous result that effort to take them out of New York Harbor was! Two of them in collision and two of them landed in the mud. You scarcely ever see—I will not say that—but almost every month you read of some mark of inefficiency upon the part of those who are charged with the conduct and management of the Navy. Why is it—why should it be so? We pay enough to create our Navy; we pay enough to give scholastic information to these cadets of ours. I take it it is because of something else, something of the higher grade of qualification in the naval officers that is lacking. We do not punish naval officers. Of the twenty-six instances that I have referred to, the severest punishment inflicted upon any officer was the decision of a court-martial that he should be put upon shore pay for three years, and that was cut down by the clemency of the Executive to two years. That was the severest penalty. There is no punishment inflicted upon naval officers except in most extraordinary cases by a system of courts-martial selected from among the friends and associates and old classmates of the man who is to be tried. It is a mockery, a mockery, and it results in, I believe, this condition of inefficiency. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that I may have ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may have ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire at the outset to confess that I have not entirely forgotten when I was a boy. I fear that some, judging by what they say, have forgotten the exuberance and the spirit of their boyhood. I spent nearly two weeks with the committee at our Naval Academy investigating, as we thought, very thoroughly the conditions there, and I stand here at the very outset of what I have to say to speak a kind word for those boys at Annapolis. I say that you can not find 900 superior boys in the United States. [Applause.] There may be here and there something done which should not have been done, but when one stands here upon this floor and elsewhere and pronounces a sweeping denunciation upon the cadets at the academy I rise in my seat and speak a word of commendation of their honor and their integrity. [Applause.] We are not here dealing with villains and outcasts. We are dealing with young men who have been selected by representatives of the American people in their official capacity because of their worth and their merit and their standing and their representative character in their local districts and have congregated them at that academy for a high and a noble and honorable career. I say to you that if you take it as a class they give assurance of success——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Did you find a spirit among these boys and a desire to hold in contempt and set at naught the laws enacted by Congress to prevent hazing?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; we did not. There were a few instances where the boys did what they ought not to have done, but the great bulk of these cases of hazing were immaterial things, which I dare say are taking place in the schools all over this country to-day and are unnoticed. They took place in the school that I attended, and I dare say in nine-tenths of the schools which nine-tenths of the Members of this body attended.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I see, on page 11 of the report of the hazing committee, and you are one of the members——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This language (page 11 of your committee report), and I ask you to explain what is meant by it and what you think of the situation.

Your committee is of opinion, however, that action by this class was discouraged by four or five members of the class who are strong in influence, if not in scholarship. Several of these young men appeared before the committee and defended hazing, declaring, of course, in favor of moderate hazing only. Their attention was called to the fact that every outbreak of hazing, both at Annapolis and West Point, has ended in the death or serious injury of one or more men; that they were attending a Government school to graduate into Government service, and that therefore the ideas of the Government should prevail; that Congress and the country were strongly against hazing. These facts did not seem to shake their faith. This class should receive close attention from the disciplinary authorities during their stay in the school, and any attempts at hazing should be put down with the strong hand.

Now, in that connection, I read this on page 8:

The regulations of the academy require that all officers attached to the academy having knowledge of violation of regulations or of improper conduct by midshipmen shall report the facts to the commandant of midshipmen. Our impression is that the officers and instructors construe this rule to mean cases of breach of discipline occurring in their presence. They should be required to report knowledge or information coming to them tending to show that violations of order have taken place.

Now, how many boys defended hazing, and what is your idea about this law suppressing and controlling these boys who stood there before your committee and defended hazing?

Mr. PADGETT. I will be very glad to answer the gentleman. I can not give the exact number of them, but there were two or three boys——

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman a question in that connection, and then he can answer both together. Is it not a fact one class at the academy wholly failed or refused to make your committee any pledge they would hereafter abstain from hazing?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is in this report.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Is it?

Mr. PADGETT. Only one class passed that resolution. There were two boys, I believe, maybe three, who said that this practice of hazing had been the custom and tradition of the school from time out of mind. But they themselves said they did not justify anything that was cruel or that was brutal, but the question of having their sport and their fun, one boy with another, and customs of that kind have been indulged in. Yet they were not defending; but they themselves disclaimed and disavowed cruelty and brutality.

Mr. BOWERS. Just on that point, I want to ask the distinguished gentleman a question. Who are to decide what was brutal and what was not brutal, what was mild or severe, what was proper or improper?

Mr. PADGETT. The authorities.

Mr. BOWERS. In the view of these young gentlemen about what was mild and proper and not severe, who was to determine what was proper and what was wrong?

Mr. PADGETT. Why, of course the boy would have to determine, just as every citizen has to determine the right or wrong of his conduct, the propriety or impropriety of his actions.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the gentleman think that these young men who persisted in that course are good judges of what was mild and not brutal?

Mr. PADGETT. That is not the question. The case that I was presenting to this House was the wholesale denunciation of the cadets at Annapolis because of this practice.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one more question?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. BOWERS. Does he complain against the existing law dealing with this, on the ground that this law is inefficacious?

Mr. PADGETT. I complain because of its inefficiency for some reasons that I will now proceed to give.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the gentleman deny the proposition that it is because of its resulting in the punishment and dismissal of young men, that it is because of that very fact, that the demand for this legislation arises, and not because of the inefficiency of the law?

Mr. PADGETT. I will answer that by asking the gentleman a question for illustration.

Mr. BOWERS. I will be very glad to answer.

Mr. PADGETT. Does the gentleman believe that every case of homicide should be punished by hanging?

Mr. BOWERS. I am not sure that I do.

Mr. PADGETT. You know you do not.

Mr. BOWERS. But I believe every criminal homicide ought to be punished by the law of the land as it existed at the time, subject to the pardoning power of the executive, just as I believe that every offense of hazing ought to be punished by dismissal as the law now stands, leaving it to the Executive to deal out clemency, in any case where that clemency is warranted and ought to be exercised.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not believe that every case of hazing ought to be punished by dismissal; and that I want to show. For instance, under the law as defined by the Attorney-General and as now executed by the authorities, if a first-class man at the academy says to a fourth-class man, "Bring an apple to my room," and he brings it, that is hazing, and subjects him to a trial by court-martial and dismissal from the academy in disgrace.

Mr. BOWERS. What is to prevent the first-class man from abstaining from directing the fourth-class man to bring an apple to his room, and thereby escape dismissal?

Mr. PADGETT. Now I will say in answer to that question——

Mr. RUCKER. Is it not a fact that many times the man who is thus compelled to do the thing which is humiliating is equal to the man who compels him to do it?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that there is anything very humiliating about that. I am not defending hazing; I am saying that there should be a graduated punishment, and that that punishment should be according to the character and the degree of the offense. There is a great deal of hazing. This bill provides for it. It provides for a court-martial, provides for dismissal, and even for imprisonment after dismissal. But there are cases that are mild, that are simply exuberance, and though they may be improper, do not deserve any such punishment as dismissal, and this bill authorizes them to be dealt with by the authorities as matters of discipline and to give demerits and certain other lesser punishments, graduated according to the character and the degree of the offending.

Gentlemen, we might as well stand before the country and say that every thief shall be imprisoned for life; we might as well declare that every homicide shall be punished by hanging, as to say that every case of hazing shall be punished by dismissal. It is not the severity of punishment, but it is the certainty, the celerity, and the reasonableness of punishment that makes it efficacious in serving its purpose. Let us adopt this principle in the legislation that is before us.

[The time of Mr. PADGETT having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will be expeditious.

Mr. SIMS. My colleague has stated in substance that hazing exists throughout the country in the colleges and universities. I am correct in my understanding of his statement, am I not?

Mr. PADGETT. I said it did exist very generally when I was in school. I do not know whether it does now or not.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman know of any hazing anywhere in schools or colleges that resulted in the death of the individuals hazed?

Mr. PADGETT. I could not give you any cases now. I have heard of instances of severity. I talked with a very distinguished Member of this House, who was relating his experiences to me, and he told one that was worse than anything that has developed at Annapolis.

Mr. SIMS. He is not dead, is he?

Mr. PADGETT. No; he is not.

Mr. SIMS. He might have been, though, if he had been at the academy.

Mr. PADGETT. Well, I do not know.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield to this one, but I will not yield to questions by any other gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. There are 900 students there?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. And 300 of them have violated the law?

Mr. PADGETT. To a greater or a less extent.

Mr. RUCKER. Do you not think that justifies the most severe condemnation?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not believe that any good is to be accomplished by expelling 300 boys, when perhaps only ten or fifteen of them have been guilty of offenses that would justify such punishment in the eyes of any man who had justice in his heart or in his mind.

Mr. RUCKER. I agree with the gentleman, but those ten or fifteen ought to be expelled forever and beyond any possibility of reinstatement.

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly, and the bill that is now before this House specifically provides for it. Now, what is the condition, and what is the legislation that is offered? We have a law providing for a court-martial, and that court-martial must either convict or acquit. If it convicts, the only punishment is dismissal, regardless of the seriousness of the offense—however serious or trivial it may be. No man can justify that. Now, what do we provide? We provide in this bill that hazing may be dealt with by the authorities as a matter of discipline and may be punished according to its merits. But it provides that for a single case of hazing he shall not be dismissed except upon a trial by court-martial. That was a saving clause that was put in the bill to meet a difference of views. Some insisted upon extreme measures. Others thought that the bill was too extreme, and in order to be conservative and moderate we provided these two remedies; but we provided further than existing law that in cases of cruel and brutal hazing the offender may not only be dismissed, but may be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months. So the punishment for the offense is graduated according to the degree of the offending. In other words, we have tried to make the punishment fit the crime.

Now, there is another phase of it. If this bill becomes a law, it will provide that the young men who are guilty of past offenses may waive the right of court-martial and submit to the authorities and receive punishment under the disciplinary procedure of the school; not to be dismissed, but to receive punishment for past offenses, according to the seriousness of the offense. Can any man object to that? I say in answer to the question that was asked, that it is far better to have an offender punished under a just law and receive a proper punishment than to impose an unjust punishment under the forms of law, perhaps to be followed by an Executive pardon, thereby bringing the law into disrepute before the country. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew the pro forma amendment. A great deal of talk has been indulged in here about the act of Congress in the Fifty-eighth Congress relieving three boys from the punishment for hazing. I shall not go into the details of these cases at the present time, but during the debate upon that bill I took occasion to say that the law ought to be remodeled along the lines of this bill. I have not changed my views upon that subject, but they have been accentuated and strengthened by subsequent observations in regard to this question.

Now, there is a very simple proposition before the House, and that is to make the punishment fit the crime. Now, let me illustrate. A boy is hazed with tobasco sauce and dies. The perpetrator of that offense can be punished by dismissal and forever debarred from reentering the Naval Academy, and he ought to be. Under the act of 1874, which was the only act applying to the Naval Academy prior to the act of 1903, the only punishment for hazing was dismissal, and my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], neglected to read the whole of the act, that dismissal not only is final, but that there can be no restoration at any time to the academy—that is, no reappointment.

Let me give an illustration. When General Sheridan's boy went to West Point he was a good boy and came from good fighting stock. He was naturally proud of his ancestry. That boy came there as the son of the General of the Army. The boys from all the districts in the United States took that boy, put him on a clotheshorse, made him read "Sheridan's Ride," by Buchanan Read, and before he got through he was sorry that his father had ever taken that historic ride down the valley of Virginia. [Laughter.]

That was simply a boyish prank. He laughed about it after it was all over, and so they all did. Yet it was hazing, and every one of these boys, under the strict letter of the law, could have been court-martialed, and under the act of 1874, had it been in the Navy, dismissed and forever ineligible to go back into the service.

The committee report shows that one of the favorite methods is to make a boy sit down on the edge of a chair, occupying about 2 inches of the chair, and leaving the balance between him and the back of the seat open. That is at the table; it is said to teach him table manners. Yet that is hazing, and every time a boy does that he must be tried by court-martial, dismissed, and rendered forever ineligible to reappointment to the Naval Academy or to the Navy or Marine Corps. That has been modified by the act of 1903 making the ineligibility for only two years.

My colleague [Mr. HEPBURN] calls attention to the fact that there have been twenty-six shipwrecks caused by carelessness and inefficiency since the civil war, and the most that could be done to the naval officers who were responsible was to put them on shore half pay three years, which was afterwards reduced to two years. And yet my colleague says that he is in favor of punishing the boy that makes another boy sit on 2 inches of chair—proposes to punish him worse than he could the captain of a ship who has carelessly lost his ship at sea. The utter absurdity of such a law ought to appear to this Congress, and they ought to modify it and put some good sense into it. It is like the Draconian law. Draco enacted a law and provided that death should be the penalty for all offenses. The smallest offense he said deserved death, and there could not be anything worse for murder, and so he made a uniform scale. This Congress in 1874 passed a law with a uniform punishment. At Annapolis the dismissal and perpetual disbarment of a cadet for the offense of hazing was not different for requiring a boy to go near the wall in passing through the corridors, or to sit on 2 inches of chair at table, or any other trivial boyish prank that you gentlemen of this House would be glad to have the young life in you now to commit. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. What Member of this House is there that would not be glad to-day to have that condition of circulation of young blood which would enable him to do such things? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that the time is rapidly passing and we have only read one section of the bill, and I shall, after this five minutes, ask to close debate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I want to say something.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Then I will withhold it for ten minutes.

Mr. LACEY. Now, I say, what would not the Members of this House, those who have reached the Osler period of 60 years, give to feel like those boys did down at Annapolis who invited some of the other members of the class to sit 2 inches only on the chair when they had been accustomed to sitting on 6 inches at home? How glad you would be to have such lifeblood coursing through your veins to-day. We have 900 boys down there and 281 of them are reported to have indulged in this foolishness. Some of it was foolishness and some of it was wickedness. It is classed all alike by the present statutes. You make absolutely every offense, the most trivial and the most wicked, subject to precisely the same punishment.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker, what would those high-class men do with the low-class men if they did not comply with these demands to sit on 2 inches of the chair, and one thing and another? How much graver offense would they commit?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing what they might have done if something else had happened.

Mr. RUCKER. What have they done in a great many cases?

Mr. LACEY. They might have followed that up by doing something that would justify their dismissal and their being barred from the association of gentlemen, but they have not done anything of that kind in the trivial offenses I have named. These trifling and insignificant offenses, such as are described by this committee, which they say have been committed by 281 boys out of 900, involve, the most of them, small offenses such as are committed in every high school and in every public school or college or academy in the United States.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And every offense, small or large, is punished with the same punishment?

Mr. LACEY. With exactly the same size of punishment. It can not be made worse, it can not be made any less, and here we find gentlemen—I think a bachelor without any children was the one that opposed this bill the most in the last Congress; and I am sorry that my friend from the Eighth Iowa district [Mr. HEPBURN] has allowed himself to forget his youth. He is still young, young in everything except years. Anno Domini is all that is the matter with him, and that is one of the things from which we can never escape. It is well and truly said that a woman is never any older than she looks and a man is never any older than he feels; and a boy at Annapolis feels young—he is young; and we should treat them as boys and make a graduated scale of punishment, one that will fit trivial offenses on the one hand and will punish aggravated offenses on the other. That is all that this committee has endeavored to do in bringing in this bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does not the severity of the punishment prevent its detection?

Mr. LACEY. Absolutely. An officer will wink at an offense rather than subject a boy to punishment that exceeds that which is right and which shocks human nature, and the officers of the academy will ignore it rather than attempt to punish him when they know they must give excessive punishment, and that is the wise purpose of this bill and I believe that it ought to pass. [Applause.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak a word for this bill and a couple of words for the boys. I wish to thank this committee for the very excellent work they have done, and to congratulate them on being able to present to this House this moderate yet comprehensive and admirable bill. They are especially entitled to the thanks of this House and the whole country because, under the present circumstances and the prevailing sentiment on the question of hazing, they have resisted the influences of the press and people who have been demanding severe and drastic treatment of the midshipmen at the Naval Academy, and have reported this fair, reasonable, and workable bill. It is very gratifying to many of us, who feared that a much more relentless law would be presented.

A few years ago an accident happened at the West Point Military Academy, by which a cadet lost his life. The papers exploited it and the country went into hysteria over it. Congress took the matter up, and an investigation of that academy was ordered. The students and faculty were examined at length. A bill for the reorganization of that institution and the abolishment of hazing was presented. Several of the gentlemen who are here now were on the floor of this House at that time, vehemently scolding those young men and insisting that a harsh, hard law for the punishment of hazing be adopted, and they accomplished their purpose. Soon thereafter the same, or a very similar law, was adopted and applied to the Naval Academy at Annapolis. What is the result? Has it accomplished the purpose claimed for it? Has it eliminated hazing from that institution? The report accompanying this bill states that at present there are at least 250 midshipmen guilty of hazing, that the great majority of those cases are mild offenses and many of them trivial in character; and yet, under the existing law, they must all be dismissed from the academy. Under this unreasonable and inexorable law all those young men must be visited with the same penalty, whether their offenses were grave or trifling. Very few Members of this House and very few reasonable people throughout the country would wish to have this law executed, and, in order to escape its results, it must be repealed.

After some experience as a teacher of unruly boys in my early days, and with such information as may be gathered by observation and experience in the ordinary college course, I do not hesitate to say that I have considerable sympathy for the boys. A little judicious hazing is not, in my judgment, the worst thing that can happen to some young fellows in their freshman year in college. Take a boy who is brought up at his mother's apron strings; who is petted, coddled, and flattered until he arrives at the age of 16 or 18 years, and thinks he is about the only thing that ever happened—full of conceit, with a swelled head. It is really a blessing to such a young man to have the vanity and conceit taken out of him and the rough corners smoothed down. He really needs a little discipline, not exactly such as the faculty can administer, which will cause him to see himself as others see him. That kind of discipline can come only in the form of hazing—not violent or brutal hazing, of course, but mild, moderate, judicious hazing—such as the upper-class men can give from their own experience. It may teach him a lesson which will last through life, and do him more good in the long run than all the Latin, Greek, and mathematics of his college course. [Applause.]

This may not sound very well to the good mothers throughout the country whose fair-haired boys are preparing for college. But there is no occasion for anxiety. The boys will take care of themselves, and after graduation will not condemn the institution or the unwritten law which administered to them some of the most useful lessons of their course. Boys will be boys, and there must be some escape for their playfulness and effervescent energies. There are many habits which may be contracted at college more vicious than hazing. Lying and swearing are worse. Telling obscene stories and reading vile literature are worse; and there are other vices more demoralizing to character and dangerous to health than a little harmless hazing during the freshman year. Accidents will happen even in the most innocent sport. Occasionally a man is killed at baseball, frequently at football, and infrequently in the graceful art of self-defense. Yet these exercises are not condemned. They are very popular with the masses and also with the classes. Multitudes of high and low degree congregate to witness them. It is believed that the benefit derived in physical development, in the training of the body and mind, more than counterbalance the danger and risk.

The death of Midshipman Branch was an accident—a very deplorable accident—but not due to the custom of hazing in the academy, but to a personal feud between him and young Meriwether. Fist fights have always occurred in this country, and will not be stopped by legislation. The result in this case was unfortunate. But it does not follow that because of the convulsion developed by that accident, 250 midshipmen should be expelled from the academy and dismissed from the service of the country.

This bill repeals the uncompromising, relentless, and automatic law which requires their expulsion. It will relieve these 250 young men from the strain, and let them settle down to their regular work and prepare themselves for the service of the nation. And I really think it will relieve our President from the embarrassing necessity of avoiding the force of that law by Executive clemency. Under this bill the Superintendent of the academy, the Secretary of the Navy, and the courts-martial will be vested with sufficient discretion to treat each case of misconduct according to its merits, and to make each punishment commensurate with the offense. It is not so inflexible and severe as to become a dead letter because of the practical impossibility of its strict administration. Those midshipmen are not thugs or ruffians who rejoice in crime. They are picked young men, full of hope and ambition and amenable to reasonable regulations and wholesome discipline. And I have faith to believe that, under the operation of this proposed law, they will be more honest, more studious, more manly, and more patriotic than under the present statute, which they must hate on account of its severity and inflexibility. This is the reason why I want to thank the gentlemen of this committee who, notwithstanding the present public sentiment, are sensible enough, big enough, and strong enough to stand up before the country and advocate this splendid, practical bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I secured a few minutes ago the report of the Congressional committee on the Annapolis hazing and its causes. I have read, hurriedly, parts of it. The report is unanimous. I will read certain pertinent parts as I come to them for the edification of the House.

I want now to say I am not here to condemn all these cadets or officers, but only the guilty ones, irrespective of who they are. Our duty demands this be done, looking, as we should, to the future of this school and the welfare of the Navy, not forgetting the parents of the victims of this hazing and the victims themselves.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Tennessee was not exactly consistent in his sweeping commendation of all the cadets at this school, in view of this report he signed without dissent. I want to read a page or two of this record, but I am afraid I will not have time to do it. Let me read, however, about four or five lines.

On page 5 of this report I read:

> The cadet officers, with whom the discipline of the academy rests, betrayed the trust reposed in them and violated their oaths by failing to report these gross violations of the law, of discipline, and of decency.
> Any disobedience by fourth-class men to upper-class men meant that the fourth-class man must fight a man selected from the upper class on account of his skill and courage as a fighter. It rarely happened that the under-class man would win. He was usually younger and had little training in athletic exercises. If he should happen to win, he must fight another and still another upper-class man until he was beaten. If he refused, his own class would send him to coventry in disgrace.

Mr. Speaker, I would not give a snap of my finger for a boy who would not fight for himself at the proper place and time, but hazing is not a fair fight, as you can plainly see. It is not like one boy standing in front of another in an old-fashioned fist-and-skull fight, with which we are all familiar. Hazing is conceived in a mean, overbearing brain.

With such a report as this, with more in point I can not stop to read, I can not agree with my colleague in his sweeping commendation of each and all these cadets.

Here we find and read from page 13 that "several of these young men" came in before this great Congressional committee and defended "moderate" hazing, and yet my distinguished colleague does not condemn in his speech "moderate" hazing, although unlawful and leads to "immoderate" hazing, I must say. As to "hazing"—"heavy hazing," I will call it—page 11, this report, says:

> The opinion of the midshipmen as a body upon this subject is not wholly satisfactory. The tendency among them is very strong to believe what are termed the "traditions of the academy."

"Traditions of the academy" they tend to follow—to believe in hazing.

Mr. James S. Brown, a graduate of Annapolis Academy, was in the Navy ten or twelve years. He is a leading lawyer of Nashville, Tenn., and when the tocsin of war was sounded he returned to the Navy and did well his part. He wrote me during the Meriwether trouble some weeks ago that hazing had existed for forty years at this school, that he was hazed, and that he believed in it. He is an honorable man. He also said that the officers are as much to blame for hazing as the cadets. If a cadet is taught hazing is right for a cadet, will the cadet, when he becomes an officer assigned to the academy, still believe in hazing and wink at it. Once a hazer, always a hazer or believer in hazing? If so, should we leave this law to be enforced in the "discretion" of these officers? Will it be best to leave to the "discretion" of these officers to enforce or not enforce this law, when he as a cadet respected the "traditions" of the academy—hazing?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to ask for the regular order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wait a moment. Let me read four or five lines. I move to strike out the last two words, Mr. Speaker. Let me read this and I will quit. I do not want to yield right now.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I withhold the demand for the regular order for two minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now let us see, gentlemen, more about the officers——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for an extension of his time for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, on page 5, what do they say in the report, which is signed by my colleague, Mr. PADGETT?

In March, 1903, Congress passed a law which required "that the Superintendent of the Naval Academy shall make such rules as shall effectually prevent the practice of hazing." There is no record that Admiral Brownson complied with this law. He did, however, call in the members of the first class and require a personal pledge that they would not haze. He secured the same promises from the second and third classes. He informed the president of each of these classes of what he desired, and the classes met and took the desired action. The understanding of the midshipmen, however, was that the agreement applied to physical hazing only. And forms of hazing other than physical, but fully as objectionable, rapidly increased.

These agreements were obtained under compulsion. The first class was informed that in case of refusal it would be sent on board the Santee and quartered there. There is no evidence to show that concessions were made in consideration for these promises; but it is a fact that some additional privileges were afterwards given. The midshipmen were hardly fair in carrying out this promise. They carried out the letter of it as defined by themselves, but such practices as requiring fourth-class men to perform menial services, sending them under the table to eat their dinners, and requiring them to tell obscene stories prevailed in an increasing degree.

He says that he brought the boys up and put them on their honor to do so and so, and that is all he did. The boys understood that it was to apply to physical hazing, but he says that fully as objectionable hazing as that was carried on.

Your committee finds that the surgeons in the sick quarters do not understand that it is their duty to make a report of fights coming to their notice, nor to make any special inquiries to determine if injuries brought in for treatment were caused by fighting, unless the injury should be of a serious nature, as in the Branch-Meriwether fight.

The midshipman before the committee testified that they felt that they could go to sick quarters for shelter from observation and to be treated for injuries received in fights without being reported. This should be corrected. We were assured by Admiral Sands that orders would be issued to make this information available to the disciplinary officers. If the boys should fail to go to sick quarters for treatment of a bruised face, for example, their appearance would be noticed in class room or drill and reported by the officers or instructors.

Now, gentlemen, shall we leave it to these officers and "cadet officers" to enforce the law or shall we make the law enforce itself? I shall not vote for any such bill as long as I live that leaves the life and limb of my boy, or yours, liable to such a practice, which may ultimately, as you know it often does, result in death. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a pro forma amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances, when a committee of this House has given careful and intelligent attention to a matter such as has been given to this bill by the Committee on Naval Affairs, I should not presume to take any time of the House; but having entered at Annapolis, in the Naval Academy of the United States, with four years' service there, and having been a graduate of the academy twenty-five years ago, I therefore presume the House will be willing to listen to my own experience for a very few minutes, because that judgment may be worth having.

Now, there has been a vast amount of hysteria on this subject of hazing which has been going on at the Naval Academy all the time for the last thirty years, and each time there has been a violent outbreak it has been responded to by Congress by enacting some law. In 1874 a law was passed, which was referred to. It was practically the result of an outbreak of hazing in the Naval Academy, and was one of the most drastic and unjust laws, in my opinion, ever enacted by anybody, without care and without investigation, which has been given to this country. There was no distinction in hazing made, and there was no option to the court-martial which tried any man.

Now, as a matter of fact, hazing differs as widely as a West Indian hurricane does from a gentle summer zephyr. Ninety-five per cent of the hazing practiced at the Naval Academy and at West Point is simply a collection of boyish pranks. Five per cent of it may be violent. I do not know any man in the Navy or out of the Navy who is not in favor of punishing violent hazing by dismissal from the Naval Academy or by any other severe punishment. But I wish to say to you that to punish the ordinary hazing by dismissal, to permit to remain on the statute books a law which provides that in any case where a cadet is found guilty there shall be no less punishment than dismissal, is unjust and unfair. It is only in cases in the Navy of a deserter where, in case the man is found guilty, the court-martial is compelled to dismiss him from the service.

In 1903 Congress enacted another hasty law in regard to hazing; passed it so hastily that it forgot to repeal the previous legislation, with the result that the Secretary of the Navy, when this outbreak which has recently taken place at Annapolis occurred and he was looking what course he should take, referred these two laws to the Attorney-General, who decided that the law of 1874 is in force and the one which was passed in 1903 was not, and that any action that was taken must be taken under that. Now, the result has been the court-martials which we have read about in the Naval Academy.

Now, the point that I have in my mind is this: That the law prepared by the Naval Committee is an infinitely superior law to those now on the statute books. Those laws ought to be repealed and this law enacted. It is not such a law as I would offer myself exactly, because I believe in limiting the authority to one person, and if I had the drawing of this bill, I would have made it so that the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, who is the responsible discipline officer of the Naval Academy, should have had full authority to punish cadets and to dismiss them. But I expect to vote for a great many laws which are not in exactly the form that I would make them if I drew them myself. For that reason I wish to say to this House that, in my judgment, this bill, prepared after careful investigation by the Naval Committee, should be passed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 48, noes 127.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, before the Clerk reads the next section I wish to offer an amendment at this point, as a new section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] some time ago offered an amendment to strike out the first section.

The SPEAKER. Is that amendment pending?

Mr. RIXEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not here, and I will make the motion myself.

The SPEAKER. The amendment has not been offered.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] had offered it. I offer it myself.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order unless the gentleman from Alabama yields.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as my motion is for a new section, I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, as I do not desire to cut anyone off; but I would like to be recognized afterwards to offer a new section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields for the present.

Mr. RIXEY. I move to strike out section 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out section 1 of the substitute.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, that section does not apply especially to hazing; in fact, it does not mention the word "hazing" at all. At present midshipmen guilty of offenses other than hazing are dismissed when they have an accumulation of demerits against them. For instance, a first-class man is dismissed when there are 150 demerits against him, a second-class man when there are 200 demerits, a third-class man when there are 250, and a fourth-class man when there are 300 demerits against him. This first section provides that the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy, after giving notice to the midshipman, without giving him an opportunity to have his witnesses heard, or to present his case in person, may be dismissed from the academy. Now, I see no reason for changing the present law in regard to the other offenses. Hazing is dealt with, and dealt with by name in the second section, and, as stated by the gentleman from Texas, the first section was not intended to apply to hazing at all, but to apply to other cases in which the present punishment and present procedure, so far as I know, are entirely satisfactory.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not provided in this section that the midshipmen shall have opportunity to be heard?

Mr. RIXEY. Oh, no; he can reply in writing, but in no other way.

Mr. CHANEY. It says here upon a report being made it shall be served upon said midshipman and require him to show cause.

Mr. RIXEY. Read it, my friend.

Mr. CHANEY (reading)—

And require the said midshipman to show cause in writing, within such time as the said Secretary shall deem reasonable, why he shall not be dismissed.

Mr. RIXEY. He is not given a hearing, except that he may transmit his reasons in writing why he should not be dismissed. No opportunity is guaranteed him by this bill to see the Secretary. He has no opportunity to confront the witnesses against him, and if he has no political influence in his favor he has to take his punishment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment as a separate section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama offers the following amendment as a separate section:

Insert a new section after line 2, page 5, to read as follows:

"That before any applicant is appointed a midshipman to the United States Naval Academy he shall be required to file in writing with the Secretary of the Navy his personal pledge of honor that he will not engage in or countenance hazing or 'running' while he is a midshipman; that this provision shall apply to midshipmen now at the academy."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there have been a great many means adopted to stop hazing at the Military and Naval academies. I only know of one that has been thoroughly successful. I understand that in those classes which gave their pledge of honor to Admiral Brownson that they would not indulge in hazing or "running" those practices were entirely stopped so far as they were concerned.

Mr. PADGETT. Not "running," but hazing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, as far as hazing is concerned that was stopped entirely.

Now, I believe we want to stop this practice. I do believe that the average boy that goes to the academy is opposed to the practice, but he finds it in the institution, that it is going on there, and he wants to keep in touch with the institution, and so he joins in it. I want to say that as far as I am concerned I have always been opposed to it, and I have always exacted a pledge from the young men that I have appointed to West Point and Annapolis—to me personally—that they would not indulge in any hazing while members of the academy. I did not pledge them not to submit if the other boys hazed them, but they gave me their pledge that they would not indulge in it themselves, and I believe fully that no boy that I have sent to either of these academies has violated his word of honor.

I do not believe the American boy would, and I believe if you will adopt this section and make the young men of the country understand that as a prerequisite to going to the academy they must give their pledge; and that with this measure you will stop it better in that way than by the enactment of a penal statute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 63, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That so much of the acts approved June 23, 1874, and March 3, 1903, as requires the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy to convene a court-martial in all cases when it shall come to the knowledge of the said Superintendent that any midshipman has been guilty of the offense commonly known as "hazing," and declares the finding of a court-martial so convened, when approved by the said Superintendent, final, and directs that any midshipman found guilty by such court-martial shall be summarily dismissed from the said academy, and also all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the present act are hereby repealed, and that the offense known as "hazing" may hereafter be proceeded against, dealt with, and punished as offenses against good order and discipline and for violation and breaches of the rules of said academy. But no midshipman shall be dismissed for a single act of hazing except under the provisions of section 3 of this act.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 18, after the word "academy," strike out the last sentence of section 2, which reads "but no midshipman shall be dismissed for a single act of hazing except under the provisions of section 3 of this act.
